For my part I cannot but think that in future days, when the history of these transactions is read, and the motives which actuated statesmen are, perhaps, forgotten, men will not cease to wonder at the first blow at the Established Church was dealt by one of her apparently most devoted adherents; that the Church of England, which sprang out of a revolt against ecclesiastical tyranny, and has been regarded throughout the world as a bulwark of civil and religious liberty, should have been sacrificed by an English Parliament to another Establishment still more widely known as hostile to freedom of thought, and intolerant of the right of private judgment; and that this sacrifice was consummated by the hands of the great Liberal party.

MR. BAXTER said, that this was one of the most remarkable of debates, because neither before nor after Easter had any who took part in it said anything in defence of the Irish Church on its merits. Hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House had framed all manner of excuses for postponement, and had suggested an equally large number of reasons, mainly based on considerations of convenience and difficulty, why the matter should be postponed altogether. He had waited patiently night after night in the hope that some hon. Gentleman would assume the courageous position that this Church of Ireland was a wise, just, and beneficent institution. He hoped the time would come when hon. Members would think it beneath their dignity to attack the religious opinions of anyone in that House. He had been sorry to hear the Secretary for the Poor Law Board (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) make a quotation from the writings of Macaulay hostile to the Roman Catholic religion. He had hoped the time when men would be attacked on the ground of creed had passed away. But, as the hon. Baronet had thought fit to quote Lord Macaulay, he would do the same. It should, however, be a quotation of a different character. Three or four and twenty years ago Lord Macaulay asked this question in the House of Commons—

"What foreigner reading over British politics does not always express his amazement that such an institution as the Irish Church should ever be permitted to exist among civilized men?"

All foreign politicians had singled out the Protestant Establishment in Ireland as one of the greatest blots in the national escutcheon. And could it be contended that a Parliament which had swept away one bad law after another would maintain a system of giving State aid to the religion of one-eighth of the Irish nation, a religion with which three-fourths of the people of that country had no sympathy whatever. He wished to be perfectly candid to the House, and would state at once with reference to what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, that he was not a defender of Established Churches at all. The day for them had gone by, and he could not understand how any man of observation—having regard to what went on ecclesiastically in the United States of America, in the colonies, in Scotland, and even in the Church of England itself—could fail to see that writing on the wall which indicated that State Churches had had their day, and that in the future they must give place to voluntary Churches. This, however, was not the question now before Parliament. The Prime Minister and those who followed him had raised the cry that the Church of England was in danger, but in doing so they had raised a completely false issue. All who had studied this question knew that Paley and all the moralists had laid down that if it was right that the State should support religion, the Church which was supported should be the Church of the majority. The Church of England established in the affections of the English people could be defended as an Establishment, and he could not help thinking that the great statesman who attempted to tie up the Church of Ireland in the same bundle as the Church of England, was the greatest enemy of the Church of England. As a moderate, not a rabid Dissenter, he had no desire to pull down any institution before the sympathies of the people were enlisted in that course. But as the admission of the Roman Catholics to Parliament had given the Protestant Church in Ireland thirty years longer to live, so he felt that the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland might strengthen for a long time to come the position of the Church of England. There was probably no greater master of the English language than Mr. Goldwin Smith, and he, in one passage, had described the position of the Church in Ireland in words which could not be surpassed. He said the great and insuperable difficulty which the Church in Ireland had to contend against was this, that Christianity could not be propagated by un-Christian institutions, and the Church of a dominant minority being unjust, could not be Christian. Members on the Opposition side of the House vied with Gentlemen opposite in appreciating the Protestant clergy in Ireland as an active, intelligent, devoted body of men; but the State aid which our forefathers believed would so greatly assist them had proved but a millstone round their necks, preventing free intercourse between them and the people. Statesmen on both sides of the House had come to the conclusion that it was necessary to establish religious equality. His right hon. Friend had come to the conclusion that this should be done by disendowment. And what was the alternative to this course? He was surprised to hear the right hon

Mr. Stephen Cave

Gentleman say that the proposition of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was tantamount to the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church. Why, had not the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland in the most distinct manner indicated his wish to endow the Roman Catholic clergy by levelling upwards? What did that mean but an impartial endowment of all sects and creeds? The alternative, therefore, was between simple endowment and indiscriminate disendowment; and he did not know any proposition more repugnant to the feeling of religious men, more utterly opposed to the spirit of the time, more calculated to light up the fires of religious discord from John o'Groat's to the Land's End than the proposition to endow all Churches alike. The endowment of all Churches would intensify and exaggerate the difficulties against which they now contended. He had been sorry to hear the argument in some quarters that disestablishment would prove a great blow to the Protestant Faith. There was no portion of the United Kingdom more likely than Scotland to resent any proposition calculated to injure Protestantism, yet what response had Scotland given to the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman? During the last three weeks nearly every city and almost every small town throughout the country had held crowded meetings, at which the Resolutions were warmly supported and adopted, and not a single meeting had been held upon the other side. Some petitions were presented against the disendowment of the Irish Church; but if ever an exception proved the rule this did, for these petitions came from the presbyteries of the Established Church of Scotland, and even those in some cases were carried only by the casting vote of the Moderator. He had paid a great deal of attention to Scotch politics and Scotch affairs, and he never remembered to have witnessed so much unanimity as he did during the last few weeks on this question; and that not alone among Dissenters, but also among Episcopalians. If the poor in Ireland could support their priests, surely the Protestants, with their great wealth and great liberality, could support those who ministered to them. With the permission of the House he would read an extract from a Protestant publication, which showed what the Roman Catholics had done—

“It has nearly 2,400 chapels, of which more than 2,000 have been built since 1800, at a cost of £3,500,000. In the same period it has established about 300 convents, monasteries, hospitals, colleges, &c., at a cost of £1,500,000, besides building 600 parsonage houses, 2,990 school-houses, and 70 Christian Brothers' schools, at a further cost of £650,000, and endowing these institutions and others, so that the total expenditure since the century opened cannot be much less than £7,000,000. The maintenance of the 28 Bishops, 2,527 parochial, and 500 regular clergy is estimated at £400,000 a-year; the maintenance of the Church at over £100,000; and of hospitals, orphanages, Colleges, &c., at £250,000. So that this Church of 4,000,000, confessedly poor, taxes itself for its annual support at £750,000, besides large contributions to the Pope, the Propagation Society, and various minor missions, and without reckoning the considerable annual outlay upon new buildings. Chapels, indeed, are rising up on all hands, not from increase of worshippers but to replace older and poorer structures; and where mass was celebrated in some miserable shed, or behind the shelter of a friendly rock, it is now performed under a Gothic roof and the full tones of the organ."

He would say to the rich Protestants of Ireland, "Go you and do likewise." Hon. Members opposite asked what was to be done with the temporalities of the Irish Church in the event of its disestablishment? This difficulty had never appeared very great, to his mind; for he believed the money belonged to the Irish people, and he did not care what was done with it, provided always that we were never placed in the same scrape by giving it to any denomination. The money at present was doing harm instead of good — [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!]-and he would give the money for any really useful purpose. There were schools to erect, harbours to improve, and roads to make, any one of which would be a legitimate channel into which to turn this money. He hoped and believed that this religious grievance, called a sentimental grievance—this Church which separated the landlord and tenant—would cease to exist, and that, as soon as the people were convinced that Parliament meant to do justice with a bold, fearless hand, they would turn away from the memories of the past, and become as loyal subjects as any of the inhabitants of England or Scotland.

MR. INNES said, that these Resolutions proposed to govern Ireland by exceptional legislation, which would be a most vicious principle to adopt. The object of this attempt to destroy the Irish Church was not to benefit that country, but to meet the exigencies of the disunited party.

LORD EDWARD CAVENDISH denied the truth of the accusation which had been brought against the Liberal party by

Mr. Baxter

hon. Members opposite, that by attacking the Established Church in Ireland they were endeavouring to bring about a dissolution of the connection between Church and State in this country. Hon. Members occupying seats on the Opposition Benches were equally sincere and warm admirers of the Established Church in England as those who sat on the other side of the House. Until recently many hon. Members who sat near him believed that some compromise upon this subject might be arrived at; but since the remarkable address of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, declaring that the Irish Church must cease to exist as an Establishment, their eyes had been opened, and they felt that the time for compromise had passed, and that they must make up their minds to vote either for or against the Resolutions of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire. He was not, however, one of those who thought that the Liberal party possessed a monopoly of good feeling towards Ireland; for he believed that the sympathies of the Conservative party in favour of that nation were deep and sincere. He could not help expressing his regret that, under these circumstances, this question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church had been made the subject of a party contest. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was blamed for making this a party question; but he thought that the blame was undeserved. During last autumn and winter the Irish question occupied a prominent position, and the Government must have known that it would be brought forward as soon as Parliament assembled; and when, on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), the whole subject of Ireland was introduced, there existed on the Opposition side a just anxiety to know what would be the policy of Her Majesty's Government. So sincerely desirous were they for the welfare of Ireland that they hoped it would be such as they could cordially support. But it turned out that the Government were going to await the result of a Commission, while the feeling of the Liberal Members was that it was useless to try to touch the case of Ireland without dealing with the Established Church. Therefore he held that blame could not be imputed to the right hon. Gentleman if this had become a party question. Well, how had he been met in the course of this debate? Results had been foretold on the other side which he, for one, should deeply deplore to see follow from the disestablishment of the Irish Church. They had been told that if these Resolutions passed the inevitable result would be to secure Papal supremacy in Ireland; they were told it would be impossible to sustain the Protestant Church in Ireland if it ceased to be an Established Church; and they were told that the destruction of the Irish Establishment would be a death-blow to the Established Church in this country. As those arguments were put forward by men of whose sincerity there could be no doubt, they were entitled to respect; but he did not think they were by any means well-founded. He had always held the opinion, though it might be considered an illiberal one, that the existence of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland had been a great misfortune to that country, and that the dependence of the priests upon the Papal hierarchy had been prejudicial to some of her best interests. The power of what the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) called a Papal hierarchy was, he believed, in many respects an injury to Ireland; but one could not shut one's eyes to the fact that the Established Church had existed for 300 years as a missionary Church, and had entirely failed. He believed that it was impossible to combat what Protestants believed to be the errors of the Irish Roman Catholics by a Church supported at the expense of those whom we wished to convert. And when we looked at this question of Papal ascendancy, it was impossible not to remember the alternative to the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, proposed by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland on behalf of Her Majesty's Government. That noble Lord spoke of a policy of "levelling up." What could that mean but endowing the Roman Catholics? Again, the Government proposed to endow a Catholic University in Ireland. He asked, could any measure be better calculated to secure Papal ascendancy in that country than to intrust to the Roman Catholic clergy the education of the middle and upper classes of the Roman Catholic laity? As to the alleged impossibility of maintaining the Protestant Church in Ireland without a State endowment, though it might be difficult to do so in some places, he could not think that, taking the country generally, the Protestant Church would be weaker than other Churches, which for a long time had depended on voluntary contributions. He would recommend hon. Members to read what had been written on the subject by Lord Dufferin. He had great doubts as to what would be the precise results of disestablishment. Time alone would prove that; but, for his part, he believed that when the day of battle did come against the Established Church of this country—as assuredly it would come—it would be all the stronger for being disencumbered of the indefensible position of the Irish Church. The arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had remained unanswered up to that time, and he ventured to think they would continue to remain unanswered. In fact, there could be no answer to arguments against maintaining a State Church for 12 per cent of the population of a country, and that 12 per cent not the poorest, but the richest portion of the entire. He regretted to hear it stated that the removal of Church endowment in Ireland would make the people bitter and determined enemies of the English Crown; for he believed that their loyalty rested upon something more than mere pecuniary considerations; and anyone must be shortsighted who did not see that this question must soon be settled. The right hon. Gentleman had entered upon the subject in a true spirit of conciliation, but his power was limited, and the result of the passing of this measure must depend upon hon. Gentlemen opposite and the Protestants, landowners, and gentry, who must decide whether they would reduce Ireland to anarchy and revolution, or, when further resistance was hopeless, would join in conciliating the Roman Catholics and Protestants, and making this a real boon to Ireland.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON, while complimenting the noble Lord who had just sat down on the liberality of his speech and the fair manner in which he had treated the arguments of his opponents, was surprised that the noble Lord should have arrived at the determination of supporting a measure the results of which he admitted to be so very doubtful. He did not see why solemn compacts made with the Irish Protestants and their ancestors should now be broken. He could not see why the Established Church in Ireland was not only to be swept away, but insulted and reviled as if it had been a source of injustice. If these arrangements had been made by the Irish Parliament, and were supposed to be antagonistic to Imperial interests, there might have been some excuse for putting an end to them; but they were the solemn engagements of the Imperial British Parliament, and forced upon Ireland for the general good of the Empire. Who were the people whom it was now proposed to deprive of rights which they enjoyed by a prescription of three centuries? They had not been disloyal, nor had they weakened the Empire. They had shared in all the great struggles of England—in her adversities and in her glories; how, then, could they deserve this insulting repudiation of their rights? The Irish Protestants had on all occasions shown themselves loyal and anxious to maintain the Union, and they were naturally indignant at the extraordinary act of injustice which it was now proposed to perpetrate. Were they to be treated as outcasts who were not entitled to the legitimate results of their constitutional bond with this country? The Protestants of Ireland were told that they had forfeited the rights secured to them by the most solemn obligations; but, in the present debate, not a single argument had been adduced for the course it was proposed to take. He did not mean to say that Parliament might not, under certain circumstances, be justified in destroying the Irish Church; but he did maintain that it never could be justified in doing so at the exclusive cost of one portion of Her Majesty's subjects, and in defiance of the protest of those with whom the compact had been made. The power of Parliament to perpetrate such an act of injustice he, for one, did not deny, although some hon. Member had rashly declared that Parliament did not possess that power. He admitted that the Legislature had the power to commit any act of infamy, robbery, fraud, and oppression; but all its power could not efface the stigma attaching to a dishonourable action. The only historical parallel which bore any resemblance to the sudden announcement of the intended destruction of the Irish Church was the act of outrage and villany committed by Louis XIV. when he revoked the Edict of Nantes. By that infamous proceeding, not only were the Protestants of France deprived of their rights, but they were immediately afterwards subjected to a fierce persecution and driven out of the land. A similar result might be expected if Parliament sanctioned the present proposal, which, like the revocation of the Edict of

Lord Claud Hamilton

Nantes, emanated from the Court of Rome. Its hand might be traced in the present movement, which, if successful, would tarnish the national character and good faith of England, as the act of Louis XIV had injured France. The argument alleged in justification of the policy of confiscation was that a system of oppression and injustice had prevailed for three centuries in Ireland; but if England felt that she were culpable, why did she not herself perform penance for her past misconduct, instead of transferring all the penance to the Irish Protestants and making them the scapegoats, to be driven into the wilderness of disendowment on account of English transgression? When negro slavery was abolished in our West Indian possessions the Government of the day acted honestly and taxed the country in order to indemnify the slaveowners; whereas here it was proposed that a peaceful population, who did not sympathize with Femonianism, and who would not be driven into disaffection, should be vicariously punished, and be the only sufferers. It had been asserted that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be an act of justice which no one would dispute. It was very easy to make such an assertion, but it was not quite so easy to prove it. It was an idle statement, and he should give one or two authorities to prove it. Dr. Slevin, formerly at the head of the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth, said the present possessors of Church property in Ireland, of whatever description, had a just title. They had had bonâ fide possession of it for all the time required for prescription, even according to the Roman Catholic Church, which required 100 years. He might even appeal to the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill): he did not know to what Church he belonged, but he was an authority recognized on the subject, having shown great genius and taken great pains to investigate public questions. That hon. Member described the "alien Church" as no longer supported by revenues drawn chiefly from the Roman Catholic population, but by a rent-charge paid mostly by the Protestant landlords. The confiscations had not been reversed, but the hand of time had passed over them; they had reached the stage at which, in the opinion of reasonable men, the reversal of an injustice is but an injustice the more. It was also said that the Church was a badge of conquest; but that argument had been altogether imported from England, and had not been at all used in Ireland. Could anyone say that the Church in Ireland had been any more a badge of conquest than the coin of the country and the language imported into the country, and the existence and authority of the Sovereign herself? Again, it was said the Church should be done away with on the ground of expediency; but the Roman Catholic Bishop of Meath had lately said the great and sole question for Ireland was the land question, and that other agitations, such as that against the Established Church, were calculated to introduce a bitterness of feeling between the landlords and tenants of Ireland, and to precipitate that social catastrophe the friends of Ireland were all anxious to avert. The Tablet newspaper also said if the Established Church were abolished, and if the Roman Catholics were put on an equality with the rest of the religious denominations, only one cause of discontent would be removed. The late Mr. Justice Shee said that the Church in Ireland had the prescription of three centuries; and the right hon. Anthony Blake, another Roman Catholic gentleman, said the Church in Ireland could not be destroyed without danger to property and order, and to all the blessings they derived from living under a lawful Government and a free Constitution. The right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey), speaking on behalf of the late Government, said the Established Church existed upon the prescription of centuries, and could not be abolished without all the horrors of a revolution. Earl Russell, in one of his pamphlets, said that to abolish the Church in Ireland would be politically injurious to the country, and would be the commencement of a religious war. No doubt one pamphlet from that noble Lord's pen succeeded another so rapidly that possibly a new edition might be in the press correcting what had appeared only a fortnight ago; but when clothed with the responsibilities of Office he held very different language from that he had lately uttered. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was once a most ardent supporter of a state of things very different from that which he now proposed to establish. When did his conversion take place, and when did the scales drop from his eyes? Was it only when he went to the Opposition side of the House? This was an important consideration; for one of the right hon. Gentleman's Colleagues (the Duke of Argyll) lately stated that public men were obliged under the responsibilities of Office to modify some of their opinions, and to intensify other opinions in Opposition. Now, as an Irish Protestant, he denounced this system of treating Irish questions, and especially an important Motion like the present one, which really tended to the disseverance of the Union. He had quoted the opinions of men allied to the party now in Opposition, to show that there was really no argument to be found in favour of the assertions that the existence of the Church was an injustice and that it ought to be abolished on the ground of expediency. The only attempted justification for this step was the blowing down of the wall of the House of Detention at Clerkenwell by the Fenians. But the Fenians utterly repudiated having anything to say to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. What the Fenians wanted was the destruction of the power of England in Ireland, and the establishment of a free republic. Another allegation was that the Catholic party, not having been represented in Parliament at the time the Act of Union passed, were not bound to accept the settlement of the Established Church. But he submitted that at the time of the passing of the Union it was intended that the Establishment of the Church in Ireland should be permanent and inviolate. He considered it to be a very dangerous argument to deny the obligation of a solemn compact, because a certain set of persons were not consenting. Might not this be applied to the repudiation of the National Debt? How can one generation bind another, if this method of reasoning is adopted? Another allegation was that the proposed change would establish equality among all parties. Would that be the case? In England the majority had a Church provided for them by the State. In Ireland the Roman Catholics formed a considerable majority; but the proposition of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire would not provide a Church for them; and it would, moreover, place the Protestants of Ireland, who were members of the United Church of England and Ireland, on a footing of inequality with their Protestant brethren in England. It was commonly stated that this much-maligned Church of Ireland had totally failed to discharge its functions. That he denied. He was perfectly prepared to acknowledge that, for two centuries, the English Government made use of the Irish Church as a political engine; but that was no fault of the Church, which resisted as much as it could the steps taken to employ it in such a capacity. For political reasons, it was not allowed to publish Prayer Books in the Irish language; so that fair play was not allowed the Church in its endeavours to reach the hearts of the Irish people. That state of things had now altogether ceased; but it was most unfair to charge the Irish Church with making no progress, when, for political reasons, that Church was treated in the way he had described. There was infinitely more attachment in the Irish mind to the rites and ceremonies and services of the Church than existed in England. The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had based one of his arguments for the disestablishment and disendowment upon the fact that the Protestants in Ireland did not number more than the population of Manchester or Liverpool; but the hon. Member ignored the fact that those people were scattered over the whole country, and therefore required a number of people to provide for their spiritual wants. It was the greatest mistake, therefore, to say that there was a superfluity of revenue and of clergy in Ireland. Those who lived in Ireland and were constantly applied to for subscriptions for church building and additional curates, were fully aware of the real state of the case. There were anomalies in connection with the Irish Church which everybody acknowledged, and which everybody was anxious should be removed; but the existence of these anomalies afforded no argument whatever for the destruction of the Establishment. In times past, the Government of this country had treated the Irish Church unfairly—had treated it for Imperial and not for Irish purposes—and the country was now reaping the fruits of that policy. The Penal Laws, which were not a Protestant institution, but existed before the Reformation, had been used for political purposes in the same unfortunate direction. The most puzzling part of the question now under discussion was to know what good end it could possibly serve to break the sacred contract between the Irish branch of the Established Church and the State? Could it be expected that henceforward persons would have the slightest confidence in their institutions and enactments, when they saw justice, honour, and good faith sacrificed in this effort to obtain a party triumph and political power? There were no solid grounds for such a step; and, if the step should unhappily be taken, it would inflict on the Irish Protestants a grievous wrong, and cause a lasting injury to the Empire at large.

Lord Claude Hamilton

MR. REARDEN said, he would recommend to the attention of the House the following quotation from a satirical work published by Thomas Moore more than forty-five years ago, which aptly applied in the intense hostility, existing then as well as now, against the monstrous injustice of maintaining the Established Church incumbrance upon the Catholic people of Ireland:—

"As long as millions shall kneel down,
To ask of thousands for their own;
While thousands proudly turn away,
And to the millions answer 'Nay!'
So long the merry reign shall be
Of Captain Rook and his family."

But the death-knell of that Establishment had been sounded by the vote before Easter on the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire; and it must be admitted that it had not only utterly failed as a missionary Church, but, as shown by the following list of the various titles by which the religious denominations were returned to the Irish Registrar General at the Census of 1861, proves that it had ludicrously failed to hold its own:— "Unitarians, Covenanters, Reformed Presbyterians, Moravians, Seceders, Christian Brethren, United Presbyterian, Evangelical Unionists, Separatists, Lutherans, Presbyterians, Non-subscribing Presbyterians, Dissenters, Free Church of Scotland, Protestant Dissenters, Christians, Plymouth Brethren, Catholic Apostolic Church, Primitive Methodists, High Church, Latter Day Saints or Mormons, Christian Israelites, Orthodox Presbyterians, Greek Church Brethren, Arians, Disciples of Christ, Calvinists, Congregationalists, Evangelical Church, Free thinkers, Secularists, Deists, Evangelical Protestants, New Lights, New Jerusalem Church, Non-conformists, Darbyites, Swiss Protestants, Seceding Presbyterians, Members of the General Assembly, Kellyites, Believers in Jesus, Protestants of no particular Sect or Denomination, Welsh Methodists, Swedenborgians, Sinners saved by Grace, Old Lights, Universalists, Independent Presbyterians, Reformed Church, Dissenting Presbyterians, Bible Christians, Trinitarians, German Protestants, New Connection Methodists, Calvinistic Methodists, Members of Christ's Church, Anabaptists, Churchmen, French Protestants, Swiss Church, Eastern Reformed Presbyterians, Free Churchmen, New Church Socialists, Church of Denmark, Arminian Methodists, Lady Huntingdon's Connection, Walkerites, Morrissonians, Episcopal Church of America, Palatines, Remonstrants, Brethren in Christ, Church of Christ, The Word of God Alone, Seekers, Materialists, Rationalists, Cromwellian Protestants, Puseyites, French Church, Italian Protestants, Swedish Protestants, Swiss Reformed Church, Welsh Church, Prussian Evangelical Church, French Evangelical Church, Evangelical Waldensian Church, Primitive Seceders, Arminian Presbyterians, Baptist Presbyterians, Free Church of Switzerland, Cameronians, Association Methodists, The Bible Alone, Self Opinion or the Church of God, Saint of No Sect, Non-Sectarian Orthodox, Theist, Philanthropist, Positivists, Political, Nonconformists, No particular Persuasion, Undecided, Doubtful, Hindoo, Unbeliever, Atheist, No Religion, Christian Teetotalizing, Christian Temperance, Peculiar People, Recreative, Religionists, Christian Israelites." He should oppose the disestablishment of the Church of England, as it is the Church of the majority of the British people; but, in Ireland, the Church of 500,000 Protestants, for the cure of whose souls ecclesiastical property to the amount of £13,000,000 sterling was appropriated, was the greatest injustice ever perpetrated. He had a better opinion of the Protestants of Ireland than to believe that their souls were in such a hopeless condition as to require the application of enormous revenues arising from such endowments to cure them. As for his countrywomen, he was proud to think that they did not stand in need of it—and certainly the babies did not require it—and the men were not so incorrigible as the mistaken friends of the Church, who insisted upon maintaining the monopoly of its endowments, would lead us to infer. As to the men, he ventured to say they would not feel complimented by the zeal of their friends endeavouring to make the House believe that their souls were in so totally incurable a state as to need the expenditure of a revenue of £900,000 per annum to restore them. The monopoly of such a revenue by so small a minority of the people, to the total exclusion from its advantages by the millions of Her Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects in Ireland, was too intolerable to be any longer endured. He would put a case to the House—Suppose England and Ireland were at war with each other, and we were now engaged in arranging the preliminaries of peace, and that one of the conditions proposed by Great Britain was, that the Catholic people of Ireland should recognize the Protestant Church Establishment, and submit to the appropriation of all the ecclesiastical property and endowments for the exclusive use and benefit of the Protestant portion of the population, could the House suppose that those who represented the Catholic people of Ireland would, for an instant, entertain a proposition so unreasonable and insulting? He assured the House that he expressed the sentiments of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland in stating that the disendowment and disestablishment of the Irish Church, and separate and independent legislation for Ireland, and the expenditure of her revenue in the development of her resources, were sine qua non conditions to the consolidation of the connection between the two kingdoms. The annual drain of at least £12,000,000 in revenues and in absentee rents; and of not less than £3,000,000 in profits, arising from the monopoly held by British traders and manufacturers of the manufacturing and trading markets of Ireland, which for the most part are employed in the enrichment of Great Britain, to the manifest injury of every interest in Ireland and the utter ruin of her artizan and other labour markets. These were amongst the main sources of the contrast between the wealth of England and the poverty of Ireland. The disendowment and disestablishment of the Irish Church, and the concession of separate legislation to Ireland would unite, strengthen, and consolidate the connection between the two countries, and promote, develop, and secure the power and resources of the British Empire: with such essential concession—less than which the people of Ireland would never be content with—the entire power, strength, and resources of Ireland would, whenever necessary, be at the service of Great Britain; and Ireland would thenceforth look upon the honour and glory of England as her own, as she would have no grievance left unredressed. From 1782 to 1800, when the Parliament of Ireland regulated her affairs, and had the control and expenditure of her own revenue, the progress of her trading, manufacturing, and agricultural prosperity equalled, if it had not exceeded that of England, in the same space of time. Let the Irish Church be disendowed and disestablished and the other primary measures be granted, and the Roman Catholics of Ireland would vie with each other in doing acts of kindness to their Protestant friends. They would make them forget the annoyance they must naturally feel in being deprived of a monopoly which had been in their possession for 300 years. He believed that such a course of conduct which might be confidently anticipated on the part of the Roman Catholic population of Ireland towards their Protestant friends and neighbours would unite them cordially in promoting and maintaining peace, law, loyalty, and order, would secure the welfare and enrichment of Ireland, and the honour and prosperity of the United Kingdom.

Sir JOHN HAY: Mr. Dodson—I should be sorry if this debate were to close without some one rising to express the views which I confidently believe are held by my countrymen North of the Tweed. I am far from assuming that I can speak with any sort of authority; but connected as I am with Scotland, and knowing as I do the great interest felt by many on this subject, I shall ask the indulgence of the Committee for a few minutes whilst I state, so far as I know it, the feeling entertained on this subject in Scotland. In Scotland there exists a strong religious sentiment, and that religious sentiment is expressed in general by various forms of Presbyterian worship. Three principal bodies exist, with no difference whatever in creed, and only slightly differing in forms of Church government. First, the Established Kirk; second, the Free Kirk; third, the United Presbyterian Kirk. These three Churches, and the less numerous Presbyterian Churches which exist in Scotland, as well as a large proportion of the members of the Scotch Episcopal Church, have one common bond of union, stronger even than their nationality—and that is a strong Protestant feeling; a feeling that nothing would tempt them, in any way, to assist or countenance the Roman Catholic Church. They think her belief erroneous; they are distrustful of her promises; they hate her tenets; and are jealous of her power. Those of whom I now speak comprise more than five sixths of the Scottish people, and their opinion is surely entitled to some consideration at the hands of this Committee. The first three Churches I have mentioned—namely, the Established Kirk, the Free Kirk, and the United Presbyterian Kirk, constitute the worshipping assemblies of a very large majority of the Scottish people. They all have the same form of Church government; they all have the same form of worship;

Mr. Rearden

but only the United Presbyterian Church differs from the others in this—that it disapproves of the Union between Church and State. The principal, and indeed the only subject of difference between the Established and the Free Kirks is the question of lay patronage; and would that I could live to see the time when that small point could reasonably be conceded to those who otherwise are so closely united to each other—united in the strong bond of Christian love, and of a bold and unshrinking antagonism to superstition and to infidelity. Those who are in the communion of the Free Kirk prefer to elect their own pastors; whilst the Established Kirk prefers to have their pastor chosen by the patron who may be legally entitled to perform that duty. But both these Churches believe that it is advantageous for the realm that the State should be Christian and Protestant. The Established Kirk, after a noble contest for freedom in what are still known in Scotland as the “old persecuting days,” became legally the State Church, and faithfully performed its mission of civilizing and educating the people. The Free Church in our own time, on the question of patronage, also made a noble and spirited sacrifice; and, rather than yield its conscientious convictions, preferred to separate from the Established Church. Since then it, too, has performed a noble mission, and the rancour inseparable from the first strife having long passed away, these two Churches work hand in hand for the spiritual and temporal good of the nation. But the Committee must remember that both the Established Church and the Free Church are not only favourable to the principle of connection with the State, but they are both endowed Churches. The Established Church has an endowment settled on it by the Act of William and Mary; the Free Church has an endowment settled on it by the generous sacrifice of its congregations. But this endowment of the Free Church of Scotland is entirely opposed to the voluntary principle. The voluntary principle, as I understand it, is that the existing congregation or its representatives shall, from time to time, appropriate certain money for the support of the clergy, and for the decent performance of religious rites, but that no permanent endowment shall be guaranteed by law. The sustentation fund of the Free Kirk of Scotland, its churches, its manse, are an endowment subscribed for, appropriated, set aside by persons in our own time, with a heroic denial and self-sacrifice, but the capital of which is legally appropriated to the service of the Free Church and on the interest of this endowment the services and the ministers of the Church are assisted in decent and honourable maintenance. Well, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire turns his attention to Scotland, and proposes to disestablish and disendow the Established Kirk and to disendow the Free Kirk, what will be the feeling of Scotland? The right hon. Gentleman has become the apostle of the voluntary system, a recent convert, no doubt, and perhaps a dangerous one, were he not "everything by turns and nothing long." If the right hon. Gentleman ventures to lift his hand against the endowments of the Established and Free Kirks of Scotland, he may perhaps find out to his cost the meaning of our old Scottish motto—Nemo me impune lacessit. But if it be so dangerous to meddle in Scotch affairs, let me ask my countrymen, Can they supinely look on whilst the right hon. Gentleman commences his Church robbery in Ireland? I maintain, without fear of contradiction, that it is as unjust and as illegal to apply the endowments of the United Church of England and Ireland in Ireland to secular uses, as it would be to seize the revenues or endowments of the Established and Free Kirks of Scotland, and I sincerely advise my countrymen to look out for squalls. But it has been said by the hon. Member for Surrey that the United Church of England and Ireland is not the Church of the Irish nation. If he means The Irish Nation newspaper I suppose he may be right; but if he means the Irish people as represented in this House, he is greatly in error. I only know of one legitimate way of judging of the wishes of a people—that mode is by attending to the votes and speeches of their representatives. Well, I have heard as much Irish eloquence on one side as on the other; and as for the votes, 46 voted with us, and 55 with the right hon. Gentleman. Now, is a majority of 9 sufficient—suddenly, and without notice—to reverse the policy of ages, and to destroy, subvert, root up the Protestant Church of the majority of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland? What the right hon. Gentleman is doing is getting up a faction fight—Ulster against Munster, and Leinster against Connaught. Well, if that is to be our policy, let us withdraw the police and the soldiers and leave them to fight it out. I have every esteem for the people of Cork; but I believe that in Ireland, as elsewhere, the North will probably be victorious. It has been said, in the course of this debate, that even in Ulster the Presbyterian Church had found some of its members to join in the cry for disendowment. Well, I wondered that the Ulster Presbyterians, who have something of the Scotchman in them, should any of them have been found willingly to sacrifice the Regium Donum; but I find the solution to this anomaly in a letter written by a noble Friend of mine, who has considerable estates in the North of Ireland. The letter is a very remarkable one. Its writer, Lord Dufferin, is one of the best of landlords, and we all know his public worth. He, at least, I am sure always acts under the feeling of noblesse oblige. Well, my noble Friend has written a letter in which he says, in effect, to the clergy on his estates—"Give up your endowments and vote with the Whigs. I will make up your losses; I will endow you again; under my ægis you shall be safe, and like Job your last state shall be better than your first." A tolerable bid for a Whig vote. But what of the poorer landlords whom it will ruin to be as generous, and what of the poor parsons—or rather congregations—on estates which have no margin left for a second endowment. Now, I remember before the days of Italian unity and railways, when Italy had a monopoly of brigands and assassins, a story of an old English traveller who, with a young artist, was making a tour and gathering pictures for an English collection. They were stopped by brigands, and the more youthful traveller wanted to fight; but the elder said, "Oh, no, rather give up all we have than have our throats cut; there is plenty more money to be got from Torlonia when we get safe to Rome." Now, it seems to me that the right hon. Gentleman, the Captain of the Band, has stopped the Church coach, and that some of the Ulster Presbyterians are willing to be robbed only on the ground that there is plenty more endowments to be got from Lord Dufferin; or, perhaps, when the Irish Establishment, under its Whig guides, succeeds in getting safely to Rome. I do therefore earnestly desire to call upon my Scottish countrymen not to join in this robbery of endowments. Depend upon it, if they do, they will be the next to suffer—or, if not, this will happen, and soon. A very strong party exists in this country who are in favour of endowments, who will not willingly see things sacred applied to secular uses. At present my Roman Catholic friends are on the side of the Liberation Society: they are for pulling down the Protestant Church and its endowments. But when the Church is down and the scramble ensues, they will know how to take advantage of the crisis, and claim in Ireland for the sacred uses of the Church of the majority the funds which our forefathers had piously dedicated to the service of the Church. When that time comes, let my Protestant friends beware. There are many men who will be in great difficulty then in deciding how to act, and the result may be—nay, probably will be—that, from fear of sacrilege, from fear of the injury to the endowments of England and Scotland, Popery may yet be endowed in Ireland. We know that Earl Russell has expressed his conscientious desire to endow Popery with a third of the Irish revenues of the Established Church. From that evil and mischief I fervently pray “Good Lord, deliver us.” But in order to prevent it, the Protestant people of these countries must rally round the Conservative party; and whilst encouraging all freedom of conscience, must resist this insidious attack upon the faith we hold, and which cost our fathers so dear.

Mr. G. YOUNG said, he thought that the complaint of the hon. and gallant Member (Sir John Hay) that no representative from Scotland had taken a part in the discussion, might have been made to justify in some measure the desire of the Government to protract the debate. In his opinion there was no reason why this question should be regarded by Scotch Members in a different point of view from that in which it was regarded by English Members. Scotland was a Protestant country like England, and the only ecclesiastical difference between them was that the majority of the people of England were Episcopalian, while the vast majority of the people of Scotland were Presbyterians. That was the reason, as they all knew, why the Episcopalian Church was established in England and the Presbyterian Church established in Scotland. In both countries the Established Church was in reality the Church of the people. He demurred to the proposition that the union of Church and State was a question of principle, and maintained that it was altogether a question of expediency. There were in Scotland, as in England, great varieties of opinion on ecclesiastical matters: but in Scotland they related, in a great measure, to matters of comparatively inferior importance; and, notwithstanding those differences, the people of Scotland, as a whole, regarded the Established Church in that country with affection and pride, because of the purity of its doctrines, the simplicity of its worship, and its freedom from excesses and extravagance, and also because it had fulfilled, and was still fulfilling, its mission as a national Church; and were it attacked its defenders would be found far more numerous than its assailants. It was not disputed that the Irish Church was the Church of only a small fraction of the Irish people. In his letter of Monday Thursday the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government referred to what he called “the sacred union of Church and State.” He demurred to the word “sacred” so used. That union might exist for a sacred purpose; but it differed in no respect from any other contract having a religious end. It was in no respect different from the compact between a private individual and his domestic chaplain, or between a Dissenting congregation and its clergyman. As in the other cases he had stated by way of illustration, it was a compact on the one side for services to be rendered, and on the other for the acceptance and the remuneration of those services. In its nature it was a civil contract, and the question whether it should be made or continued was not a sacred question, nor even a question of principle, but one of mere expediency. They were not precluded from considering at any time whether it had answered its purpose or not, or from putting an end to it if it had not. The question as to the wisdom of having an Establishment might be answered differently at different periods and in different places. It was expedient in England and in Scotland, because it had answered its purpose; it was not expedient in Ireland, because there it did not answer its purpose. The only danger to which he could perceive that the Establishments of England and Scotland were exposed arose from the course taken with regard to this question by the hon. Gentleman opposite. It was very dangerous to say that they must have Establishments everywhere, because they were matter of principle, or have no Establishments anywhere; that if they had no Establishment in Ireland, they could not continue to have one in England. Why, the argument about a "sacred union" and a matter of principle would be equally valid as applied to Ireland if there were not a single Protestant in that island. He supposed that hon. Gentlemen opposite would hardly go that length. In every question of expediency they must regard the whole circumstances. Surely it was not expedient to have an Established Protestant Church in a country where the Protestant inhabitants were only an infinitesimal part, or an eighth, a ninth, or a tenth of its entire population. Her Majesty's Government not only admitted that religious equality did not exist in Ireland, and that it was expedient there; but they proposed to produce it. But how? By levelling, and levelling upwards. Let them mark the import of the word "levelling." He supposed they were to put all religious denominations in Ireland on an equal footing with reference to what the Foreign Secretary called an "empty title," with reference also to what the hon. Member who re-opened the debate that night (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) called a "barren precedence," and with reference likewise to endowments—for that was the substantial matter—so far as was necessary to produce a level among the various denominations. Thus, they were to have a "sacred" union upon "principle" with the Episcopalians, with the Presbyterians, with the Roman Catholics, and all other denominations in Ireland! For his own part, he should be at a loss to express the principle, sacred or profane, which would lead to that result. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), in that remarkable speech which he delivered at the close of the debate before Easter, announced that "The policy of the Government with respect to Ireland is to create, and not to destroy." If any hon. Gentleman was able to attach any definite meaning to those words, as so used, he had, he confessed, greatly the advantage of himself. If the Irish Church, as an Establishment, was an evil in Ireland, among other things, to the Protestant cause, as he contended, what answer was it to the proposal to disestablish it—that was, to abate the evil—to say that the policy of the Government was to create, and not to destroy? Was it the policy of the Government to create evils, and not to destroy them?—to create anomalies, to create confusion, to create mischiefs, and not to destroy them? If it was merely intended that they wished to create that which was good, and not to destroy it, that was a very wise, but not a very profound policy, and one hardly worth announcing. Every Government, he supposed, would profess, not only with respect to Ireland, but to the whole Empire, that its policy was to create that which was good and not destroy it; but that was little to the purpose upon the question whether the Irish Church should be maintained as an Establishment or not. Whatever might be the policy of the Government, he supposed that that of the House would be to destroy the evil of the Irish Church, if it was found to be an evil; and not to attempt to counteract—which he believed to be an impossibility—its influences by "creating" other Establishments, and raising them up to the same level. He had said that the Irish Church had been injurious to the cause of Protestantism. That was only a part of the case against it; but it was a material part. The fact of its existence for 300 years—of which so much was said by hon. Gentlemen opposite—was a strong feature of the case against it. It had existed—as a Protestant Church planted among a Roman Catholic population must exist—as a missionary Church; and yet, according to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), the wealth of the Roman Catholic Church was increasing, its members multiplying, and its churches rising everywhere, while the Protestant Established Church had the greatest difficulty in holding its ground. Having more confidence than the hon. Member in the truth and power of the Protestant Church, he believed that if it had a fair field it would prevail. The Committee had been told over and over again that this was a party move; that it was brought forward suddenly, and without due notice; and that it was inopportune, because it interrupted other business. With respect to the suddenness of the move, it was impossible that those on the Opposition side of the House could have announced their policy until that of the Government was stated. During the debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire), it was promised that the policy of the Government should be revealed, as it ultimately was, by the noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland; the right hon. Member for South Lancashire stated his dissatisfaction with it, explaining wherein he thought it positively amiss, and where dangerously defective, and he further signified his intention, if the Government did not see fit to bring forward some proposition with reference to the Irish Church, to bring before the House Resolutions of the nature of those which they were now considering. Well, let it be a party move if they pleased. Might not a party move be a proper move—that was, a Motion which united the whole party in the House? They were certainly entitled to object that that was not the character of the present Motion; but upon that subject an appeal had already been made to what the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had happily called “the unerring instincts of Parliament.” Now, what he had to ask was this—were they to go on with this talk for ever; were all these topics to be debated over again? He, for his part, was content it should be so; but they must admit that the appeal had already been made to Parliament, and Parliament had answered with no uncertain sound that this was not a party move to be reprobated, but one to be encouraged. The question of the sufficiency of notice depended upon the opportunity that had been afforded for discussion, and surely that had been ample. There could be little doubt that the subject had been deliberated upon by the Cabinet even before it was brought forward in the House; and after the interval that had been afforded for the consideration of this Resolution, it might be safely assumed that it would be carried by as large a majority as was the Motion to go into Committee. It had been urged that the decision of the House had not yet been given upon any certain or definite issue; but he thought that at his hon. Friend the Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) had sufficiently explained that the question formerly decided had been, not whether the House should or should not go into Committee, but whether the Irish Church should or should not be disestablished. That they were now engaged in deciding the same question was shown by the fact that no new matter had been imported into the debate, which was solely a repetition of arguments formerly employed. There was one other topic. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, at an early period of the Session, said that the country ought to have an opportunity of considering this question, and of being educated in its bearings. What he should like to know was this—what better way was there of agitating this question, and of enlightening men’s minds upon it, than by discussing it in this House? It was a subject that would occupy men’s minds for some time to come, and the people of this country ought to know the opinion of this

Sir John Hay

Mr. G. Young

House upon it, and the ground on which it rested.

MR. WALPOLE: Without following the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. G. Young) into those collateral topics with which he concluded his speech, I think I shall best consult the feelings of the House by confining myself as closely as possible to the real issue now before the House, and that issue is the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman. Much has been said of that Resolution; and though it is true that in terms it is confined to Ireland, and to Ireland only, yet it can hardly be doubted that in principle, if not in intention, in its inevitable tendency, and if not in its immediate yet in its ultimate consequences, the whole question of Church Establishments is at issue. Gloss the matter over as you will, the maintenance of Church Establishments, and the placing these Establishments under the guardianship, control, and superintendence of the State, is really the issue we have to try. I venture to think that the hon. and learned Gentleman who has addressed the Committee with great ability and ingenuity, and the hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), who has also spoken with great ability and ingenuity, have in their arguments confounded two matters which are distinct in themselves, and ought therefore to be determined on distinct considerations. Those two matters are, first, the circumstances under which you might or might not deem it advisable to establish a national Church where none was previously in being; and secondly, the grounds upon which you would be justified in disestablishing a national Church where one already existed. If, indeed, we were now discussing for the first time whether we would establish a national Church in Ireland, I admit there are various reasons which would press upon us the consideration whether we ought to establish it in the form in which it at present exists. But the same considerations might be pressed upon us if we were considering the question with regard to the hon. Member’s own country of Scotland, or of Wales, or even England itself. In each of these countries questions differing in degree, but not in kind, might require us to give a similar answer. You must look at the views, at the feelings, the wishes of the inhabitants, and at the means provided for the maintenance of such an Establishment. In that case some might think it prudent to recognize simply and solely the voluntary principle; some might think it advisable to provide for the support of different sects of religion; but there is one thing which no one, I think, would propose, and that is when the property of the country was in the hands of persons of one way of thinking, and the great mass of the people were of another way of thinking, no one would deem it just to charge the property for the support of a religion which its owners did not profess. But the question is not now one of establishing a national Church—it is the question of disestablishing a Church, and with this question you have to consider the length of time during which it has existed, the compacts under which it has been continued, and Parliamentary engagements of which it has been the subject. These compacts and these engagements, have, I think, been treated in the course of this debate with greater levity than they deserve, and I was astonished the other evening to hear the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Buxton), plainly and deliberately assert that they were imaginary agreements made by unknown parties. I had thought that if there could be an agreement which was anything but imaginary in its character, and which was entered into by parties perfectly well known to Parliament and the country, it was the agreement and the compact made at the time of the Irish Union. I do not deny that Parliament has the power, as was said by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Exeter (Mr. Coleridge) the other evening, of undoing now what any other Parliament has done; but there may be circumstances connected with such a compact as to render imperative, in proposing its repeal, a consideration of what happened at the time when the compact was framed. We have, therefore, to consider, in the first place, what circumstances were existing at the time the compact was entered into; and, secondly, whether there are sufficient reasons for doing away with it. Now, I ask the Committee to consider the nature of that compact. We are standing here as the representatives of three distinct and separate Legislatures, formed into one by the two Acts of Union. These Acts of Union are the very charters of our existence. It is by them, through them, and under them that we are now deliberating. In these Acts of Union there are many Articles, some of them relating to trade, some to the representation of the people, some to the Peerage, some to the proportions of the National Debt which are to be borne by the nations respectively, but there is only one Article—namely, that with reference to religion—that is made binding by obligations which are declared to be fundamental, essential, and inviolable. That obligation was insisted upon because our ancestors knew too well the evils resulting from the religious conflicts in which the different parts of the kingdom had been engaged. Those conflicts related to Church government and the Reformation, and it was to prevent any recurrence of those disputes that our ancestors put into these Acts of Union clauses of such stringency that they intended to restrain Parliament from making any alteration, unless the reasons in favour of the change were strong, cogent, and irresistible. There are three or four circumstances which give additional force to those reasons. First, there is the peculiar manner in which that compact is drawn up; secondly, the fact that the Coronation Oath was altered in order to make it more binding; and thirdly, when you emancipated the Roman Catholics, and admitted them into this House, you distinctly recognized in the body of the Emancipation Act the strong and inviolable character of the agreement made at the time of the Union. To tell me that this is an Act which does not require greater consideration than other Acts, and that it may be repealed with as little ceremony as other Acts, is to make an assertion utterly untenable; and bear in mind that these contracts have been made by two parties, one superior to the other, at least in point of numbers in Parliament; and although that is no reason why you should not on sufficient grounds alter the contract, it is a reason why you should be very careful before you deprive the inferior party of the advantages you intended it to give them. What reasons, then, would justify you in altering that contract? The hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) quoted a passage from Archbishop Whately, which will try this question, when he said that—

“In order to alter such laws as these there should be a manifest inutility or a manifest hurtfulness in the institution which made it essential and important for the public welfare that it should be abolished.”

Let me apply that test. Is the institution either manifestly useless or manifestly hurtful? I have heard it said to-night that it has failed as a missionary Church, and has no merits of its own. But I find that, in point of fact, it has increased in a greater ratio than either the Presbyterian or the Roman Catholic Churches. ["No!"] Of late years it has. And when I ask myself "Is it a useless Church?" I answer, "Is it, or has it been, useless as regards the learning of its prelates, or the purity of its doctrines, or the good it has done?" Are not these fair tests? I should be loth to believe the Church of Usher, Bramhall, and Bedell in the 17th century, or the Church of King, Leslie, and Berkeley in the 18th century, or of Jebb and Mages of later times, could be described as a useless Church so far as regards the learning of its prelates. And when I look to the good it has done and the purity of the doctrine it has maintained, I ask the British House of Commons—Is it nothing to you that that Church has been the firm friend of Imperial rule, the steady ally of British freedom, and a faithful witness of religious truth? Is it nothing to you that the members of that Church have constituted a resident educated tolerant gentry, forming a nucleus of civilizing influences, and that, too, when those who ought to have set the example have absented themselves from its soil? And is it nothing to you, when open foes and secret conspirators have led their attacks upon your institutions, that you have always found a faithful and devoted people in the members of that Church? I am not going to contend that the Church has no shortcomings. That there are in it many anomalies, many irregularities, and many abuses which ought to be corrected I do not deny; but, speaking in a British House of Commons, I say that, when we talk disparagingly of that Church, we should ask ourselves whether its fault did not lie less with the institution than with ourselves. We had better ask ourselves whether we, in fact, did not do too much to make it a political institution rather than an instrument of religion. Nothing can be more disgraceful than the way, during two centuries at least, in which its revenues were taken from it, and in which lay impropriations were permitted. Anglican prelates were sent over from this country to Ireland and fed with the best benefices, and their sons and their brothers were, of course, in due time provided for. As a natural consequence the Church suffered immensely, and the Native clergy were left in a beggarly state. [An hon. MEMBER: And so some of them are now.] Yes; but the hon.

Member who says that knows things have materially altered since then. He knows perfectly well what was then the state of the churches, the glebe houses, the benefices, the number of the clergy, and everything connected with the Church down to the time of the Union; and he knows what has been done since. Immense exertions have been made to remedy the state of things which previously existed. The benefices have been increased, 600 glebe houses have been built, churches have nearly doubled, and the clergy have actually risen from 1,100 to 2,200. It might be said these were material improvements only; but let the Committee think of the conduct of the Irish clergy. The testimony of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) is strong upon this point. He has spoken of their devotedness and zeal as equalling that of any clergy of any Christian Church in the world. Not only the friends but the enemies of the Church give similar testimony, and testified to their zeal in propagating Evangelical truth. Then, I say, can you abolish this Church as a useless institution? And if you cannot break the contract on the ground that the Church is useless, can you break it on the ground that the influence of the Church is hurtful? There were times indeed when the vestry case and the tithes were extracted from the people, they had a grievance of which they could legitimately complain; but when these were abolished, and the payments were thrown on the Church's funds or the Protestant landlords, no practical grievance remained; and so you began to set up the sentimental grievance—and by some extraordinary hocus-pocus you tried to connect it with the disaffection of the people. I admit a sentimental grievance may be more galling than a practical grievance; but before you cut off that sentimental grievance by a violent measure you should satisfy yourselves of two things—first, that in doing away with a sentimental grievance as bearing on the mind of one class you do not a practical wrong, resulting in greater injury to another class. Secondly, you are bound to show that the dissatisfaction which you allege exists could be remedied by the removal of that sentimental grievance. Would a prudent physician amputate the limb of a patient suffering from a malady of the mind? Yet that is the very thing you propose to do. I ask any one, whether Irish or English, Catholic or Protestant, layman or scolar-siastic—can you, in the smallest degree, connect the present dissatisfaction and discontent with the sentimental grievance of the Irish Establishment? The truth is, the discontent of the present day differs from the discontent of all former times. What you now see is external, and fomented from abroad. It is, in fact, a wanton, wicked, and foul conspiracy—not against the Established Church—but against all law, order, and government; but the discontent you had before arose from some civil disability or practical wrong which you could redress, and if I wanted proof of that I would appeal to the remarkable pamphlet of the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill)—where, both in the beginning and end, it is there pointed out that we have done for Ireland all that a British Parliament can do. In the face of this the hon. Member solicits not merely to get rid of the Irish Church, but of every kind of religious endowment, and in the very last page he tells us that even if we do this we shall have done nothing to allay the disaffection and discontent unless we also settle the land question. For these reasons I think I have shown that, according to the terms laid down in the pregnant sentence of Archbishop Whately, you are not justified in breaking this solemn compact. You have not shown either the manifest inutility, or manifest hurtfulness of the institution you propose to destroy. Having said so much, let me advert very briefly to two or three other points. [“Oh, oh!”] I am in the hands of the House. One part of the subject has been but briefly alluded to, and with reference to this I desire to have some information from my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire. In plain words, I mean this:—By the form of proceeding you have adopted you are proposing to abolish a sacred institution, and you have not intimated to us in any manner which we can understand, what other institution you are going to substitute for the religious instruction of the Irish people? My right hon. Friend has, indeed, pointed to several topics connected with the subject which are of great importance—namely, the total value which he puts on the whole of the Church property, and the particular value which he puts on that part of the Church property which he thinks ought to be given to the life-holders of its revenues. He is, however, entirely silent with reference to the surplus or difference. And though he tells us what the condition of the Church and the clergy is to be after these valuations are made, and this property is re-distributed, I will venture to say that nobody who examines that part of the case will find that the substitute he intends to provide for it, is either a substitute in fact, or a substitute which the people of the United Kingdom will ever sanction. The value of property my right hon. Friend puts at £16,000,000, including in that valuation the parsonage houses, the churches and advowsons, the tithes, and the lands belonging to dignitaries. But he has not told us how this valuation is made up. He has not told us whether the property is to be brought into the market, and the value ascertained there; he has not told us whether the State is to hold it, and, if so, on what trusts; and he has not told us—which is the most important part of all—how much of this property has been made up of private benefaction. Nor has he alluded, even in the briefest manner, to that which has hitherto been considered the most important statute on the statute book of Ireland—namely, the Act of Settlement. When you come to examine that portion of the subject, I believe you will find—I give no positive opinion till we have the facts before us, and what I am now complaining of is that we are dealing with this question without having the facts before us—I believe you will find that the Act of Settlement secured to the Church one-fifth of the whole of its property, which property never belonged to the Church of Ireland while Roman Catholic. Nay, more, I believe you will find that the security given for that property to the members of that Church is precisely the same as that given to laymen taking under that Act of Settlement. I ask, therefore, not merely whether your valuation is correct, but whether the same principles can be applied to other portions of the property, secured by the Act of Settlement, which you are going to apply to the property of the Church? Then, with regard to the existing holders, there are two or three questions which I should like to put;—first, whether you are going to capitalize those revenues; and, if not, then whether you are going to pay the life-holders out of the revenues which the State has so taken possession of. If the former, how will you leave anything for those who come after? If you pay them out of the revenues taken possession of by the State, then when the lives of these different life-holders come to an end, I should be glad to know what is to become of the surplus. I ask this, bearing in mind one of the most important observations made by my right hon. Friend—namely, that these gentlemen would enjoy, no longer amid an alienated and discontented people, the property which had so been secured to them, but they would enjoy it with the perfect cordiality and good-will of all sects, of all persons, and all persuasions. How will this statement apply to the successors of the present incumbents, who, according to one of the alterations, will have no property at all? It is a mockery to talk of their enjoying the property with the cordiality and good-will of people of all persuasions, when you are taking away that property and applying it, possibly to some miserable secular purpose. Then I come to the more important question of the total silence of my right hon. Friend—a total silence as to what he is going to do with the surplus, or the difference between £16,000,000, which is the total estimated value of the Church property, and £9,600,000, which is the estimated interest of the life-holders. What is going to be done with that, and to what purposes is it to be applied? My right hon. Friend has been pressed by questions which made him admit that he is going somehow or other to put an end to the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum. But is the grant to Maynooth to be redeemed out of the Church property? If it is to be redeemed, what are the terms upon which that redemption is to be effected? Are you going to give them merely the life income which our clergy are to receive, or are you going to give them the full value of the £30,000 per annum in perpetuity? If you intend to adopt the latter course you are going to treat the priests of Maynooth in a different manner from what you are going to treat your own clergy. Would that be just? But perhaps you are going to redeem this grant out of the Church funds. If that be the course that it is intended to adopt, let me tell the right hon. Gentleman that he will get no support from those who are now his most able and powerful allies. From what I read of the proceedings at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, I find that Mr. Spurgeon wrote a letter to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright)—dealing with him almost as a Minister of the Crown—and putting it to him whether he was going to give as douceur to the Roman Catholics any portion of the Church property; for, if he was, nothing on earth would induce the Dissenters

M<sup>r</sup>. Walpole

Mr. Walpole

to agree to such a course. But if you do not intend to redeem the Maynooth Grant in that manner are you going to resort to the principle laid down, I am sorry to say, so often by the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), of applying this property to secular purposes? I contend that that which was given for the purposes of religion ought still to be preserved for purposes of religion. Are you going to set upon the doctrine so often inculcated by the right hon. Member for Calne, that there is a broad distinction between property held by corporations and property held by individuals? ["Hear, hear!"] "Hear, hear," says the hon. Member opposite. Has he considered upon what the rights of property depend—has he fully considered that upon the preservation of the rights of property depend all the improvement, all the progress, and all the civilization of mankind—that hitherto it has been supposed that the rights attached to property give to its owners the fullest powers of accumulation and the freest power of transmission and disposition, subject only to the qualification that it may be regulated and restricted beforehand by laws dictated by public policy? Unless property held by corporations is forfeited and abused, it stands upon precisely the same terms as property held by individuals, and the only difference between property held in these two ways is that the one is sacred to persons and the other to purposes. In dealing with property sacred to purposes you will find that more care is required than in dealing with that sacred to individuals; for it must never be forgotten that persons are fluctuating and transitory, while purposes may be and often are of the highest moment and of a permanent character. Now, Sir, having dealt with this part of the subject, I will next advert to the condition in which the Church will be left in the event of its disestablishment. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to leave the Church with the fullest power of self-management, with the fullest power of development, and entirely uncontrolled by any laws external to itself. By placing the Church in that position the right hon. Gentleman will strike at most of the objects for which Establishments have been founded, and at the means by which the doctrine and discipline of the Church is to be maintained. The objects for which an Establishment is founded are these—that in every nook and corner of the kingdom there should be provided for the people the ministrations of religion, religious instruction, public worship, and pastoral superintendence ; and if you take away from any portion of the kingdom the right to these things which the laity have hitherto enjoyed, you strike at the very root, not only of an Establishment, but at everything which the people and the country hold most dear, and which are to them full of permanent advantage. Talk of securities ! The securities the people are entitled to ask for are the securities which connect the Church with the State, and the placing the Church in due subordination to the civil power. Those are the securities which have given to the people the perfect knowledge of the worship and liturgy to be used, and the doctrines which are to be taught in their churches. What does the supremacy of the Crown consist of ? Two sets of laws—the one negative, the other positive. By the negative laws you deny the right of any foreign Prince to have jurisdiction or to exercise authority within this realm. By the positive laws the appointment of Bishops was vested in the Crown as well as a great portion of the temporalities ; and the liturgies read and the doctrines preached in the Church are settled by Courts of which the Crown is the head. Take away the right which the people of this country now possess, and I ask you, what becomes of the supremacy of the Crown ? You will then have two Church organizations in Ireland — one of them Roman Catholic and the other Episcopalian — both entirely independent of the Crown. Now, I ask, is that a favourable state of things for the stability of the British rule ? Will that strengthen the union between these countries ? Will that tend to the harmony and peace of which we have heard so much ? Will that secure to the people of this country their primary rights ? They claim at your hands perfect freedom from sacerdotal tyranny on the one hand, and from wild fanaticism on the other. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) quoted with effect more than one passage from Mr. Burke, who is full of instruction, and other passages from the opinions of the same statesman were quoted by the late Solicitor General for Ireland. But there are passages which neither my right hon. Friend nor the hon. and learned Gentleman thought of quoting, though they are the most important on this subject which Mr. Burke ever published. They are not only his general notions of Church Establishments, but they are his particular reasons for maintaining the Church Establishment in Ireland. I therefore commend them to the attention of my right hon. Friend. Mr. Burke did not, it is true, approve of the condition of the Church in Ireland. He found fault with its anomalies ; but he says he wishes well to that Establishment for several reasons. He wished well to it because it is the link which holds fast religion to the Government of the country, and which forms a sensible connection between England and Ireland. He wished it well because it is the Establishment of the religion of the great majority of the proprietors of land, with whom all Establishments ought to be connected. [“ Oh, oh ! ”] An hon. Gentleman interrupts me ; but, if he inquires, he will find that at this moment, I believe I may say, nine-tenths of the land of Ireland are held by Protestant proprietors. Mr. Burke says further that the Protestant Church of Ireland is the only one of the Churches in that country which could be connected with the Crown, such connection being the mainstay of the Constitution. I think those reasons are just as applicable now as they were in the time of Mr. Burke. With regard to that which was urged so frequently the other night by the noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire (the Marquess of Hartington)—and it is the only topic, if a true one, which ought to have a material bearing on this part of the question—I allude to the pacification of Ireland, or as he called it, a message of conciliation and peace—I wish to ask you whether, if this Resolution is interpreted as a message of peace by one party, it will not be interpreted as a message of war by the other, when they feel the wrong you are about to inflict upon them. We all of us wish—it is our most anxious wish—that disaffection and discontent in Ireland should be brought to a close. But you never will bring them to a close by irritating and attacking those who have been truest to you in all your trials. I believe that both sides of the House might adopt a policy which would enable all classes in Ireland to join amicably and cordially in endeavouring to effect the happiness of their common country ; but if you wish to enable them to do this, you must not agree to a measure which savours of class legislation, which will drive them more than ever into hostile factions, and strengthen and perpetuate rivalry and ill-feeling between race and race and creed and creed. Remember the famous saying of Baxter—"That religious freedom should be volcano's heat; and on the lava and ashes of former eruptions there should grow the peaceful olive, the cheery vine, the sustaining corn." Ireland, to our shame and sorrow be it spoken, has been torn by convulsions which were not sent as corrections from Heaven, but were scourges inflicted by the hand of man. But a new era has been recently coming upon her. Better days for her appear to be dawning; and, down to the time of this wicked Fenianism, and even in spite of that wicked conspiracy, there has grown up on the lava and ashes of former convulsions more order, more tranquillity, more industry, and more employment, kindlier feelings, warmer sympathies, higher hopes, and brighter aspirations than Ireland has ever enjoyed before. If, then, you wish this better state of things to continue, I am perfectly confident the way to realize that object is not by passing any measure which will break down fundamental laws and break through the most solemn compacts, but it is by continuing those institutions which have been the result of wise legislation, and which ought to be maintained in strict conformity with our Parliamentary engagements.

LORD ELCHO: If this were the first night of an important debate such as this, I should feel that it was an act of the grossest presumption on my part to obtrude myself upon the House; but, Sir, as you will do me the justice to admit, I endeavoured to catch your eye at an hour of the evening when the attendance in the House is usually very small. Having said this much, I protest against the tone of apology adopted by the hon. and learned Gentleman who preceded the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. He apologized for speaking at all upon this subject. Now, I hold that, be the debate long or be it short, Members of this House who have strong opinions on this question of the Irish Church have a right to express their opinions. I say this as a matter of principle, and not as a matter affecting myself personally; and I say it because I have observed that throughout this debate there has been an attempt made on this (the Opposition) side of the House to prevent discussion. ["No, no!"] The tone has been this—that the debate on this important subject ought not to be prolonged. Why? Lest it should interfere with the other business of the Session. But if it does interfere with the other business of the Session, who is to blame? I maintain that this question is now brought before the House in an entirely new light and position. Thirty years have passed during which this question has been, more or less, brought before the House; but this is the first time it has been brought forward by a person occupying the prominent position of the right hon. Gentleman, and the first time a proposition has been made from that Bench for total disestablishment. It is now neither more or less than a majority which is strong attempting to force a question through this House. When hon. Gentlemen on this (the Opposition) side talk of prolonging the Session and interfering with the course of business, it is something like knocking a man down and then kicking him for falling. Or their conduct might be compared to that of the wolf who complained of the disturbance by the lamb of the waters below the spot where he was standing. Having entered this protest, I wish to express briefly the strong feelings I entertain upon this question. I wish to enter my protest against the time and the manner, and the thing proposed to be done. The time and the manner have been apologized for by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Young) on the ground that it was a party vote, necessary to re-unite the Liberal party. I do not in any way question the right of this side to take that course. It is the traditional policy of the Liberal party to force on in Opposition measures they oppose or allow to slumber when they are in Office; as it appears to be, I am afraid, the traditional policy of the other side to carry in Office measures they oppose in Opposition. Now, that such is the traditional policy of this side of the House cannot be disputed. I well recollect the year 1848. I was a Peelite. There was a strong body of Peelites then. We had an organ in the press. [Cries of "Name!"] It was The Morning Chronicle. I well recollect an article in The Morning Chronicle of that day—the year of revolution and Chartism—which said—

"We ought to be most thankful that the Whigs were in office, because if they had not been in office the Charter would have been the law of the land, and we should have seen an ex-Whig Minister, in order to enforce it, breaking the windows in Pall Mall."

I do not know who wrote that article. We have two right hon. Gentlemen, then Peelites, who are at present Members of the Whig party—the Members for South Lancashire and the City of Oxford (Mr.

Mr. Walpole

Gladstone and Mr. Cardwell). I do not know whether either of those right hon. Gentlemen wrote that particular article; but it was their newspaper at the time. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) shakes his head; but I deliberately assert that The Morning Chronicle at that time was the political organ of the Peelite party. ["Question."] I am coming to the question, but it must have an introduction. The question is this—Suppose at that time anybody had hinted to either of those right hon. Gentlemen that they, in twenty years, would in their own persons and acts exemplify this traditional policy of the Whig party, how would they have repudiated the insinuation? But I leave both sides of the House to judge what would have been the feelings of indignation of those right hon. Gentlemen if anyone had then ventured to assert that the special way in which they would exemplify it would be by the one proposing and the other supporting the disestablishment of the Irish Church—both being the devoted pupils of Peel and Graham—of Peel, who, when he passed the Emancipation Act and the Maynooth Act, thought he had taken every necessary security for the permanent establishment of the Irish Church; and of Graham, who thought it necessary to leave the Liberal party in consequence of their measures in connection with that Church. I now come to the other point—I oppose this measure not only on the question of time, but because of the thing we are asked to do—to disestablish the Irish Church. What is the reason given for this? It is said to be a great act of atonement for misgovernment. We are to offer up as a victim that Establishment which was planted among other things to maintain English interests and English connection. I, for one, am not prepared to clothe myself in a penitential sheet, and throw ashes on my head for the misgovernment of Ireland. I do not wish to rake up history and refer to the Cromwellian severities of the massacres of Protestants, for which these measures were the reprisals. We are not responsible, I boldly assert. This generation and the last generation of statesmen have nothing to bring home to their consciences the blame of Irish misgovernment. If there were time I would show that, in respect to civil Government, Ireland was more favourably treated than any other part of the United Kingdom. When an hon. Gentleman behind me talks of the sums of money taken from Ireland, I may mention that there is a

Return on the table showing that, while the revenue in Scotland arising from taxation is double that in Ireland, the public money spent in Scotland is not one-half or one-fourth of what is spent in Ireland. When it is said that this is to be a great measure of atonement to pacify Ireland, I beg to say that it is not the religious question which agitates that country. Sir George Lewis, writing in 1833, said that the Whiteboy organization was not the result of the Irish Church. In the six years before the passing of the Roman Catholic Emancipation Act, what was the number of murders committed in Ireland? 600 and odd; and in the six years after the passing of that Act the number of murders was 1,200 and odd. As a measure of pacification at that time the Act of Emancipation completely failed; and will any man now stand up and say that at the present moment the state of Ireland would be pacified by the passing of this Motion for doing away with the Established Church? Was the murder in Ireland caused the other day by any religious cause? Was it a religious cause which in Canada brought about the death of the Roman Catholic D'Arcy M'Gee, or which guided the hand of the assassin in Australia? I say that we cannot find any cause for blame in the civil government of Ireland; and I go further and maintain that there is no cause for blame in reference to the religious government. Our policy in a religious point of view has been a policy of toleration, concession, and conciliation; and what has been the result? Every possible conciliation has been offered to a Church which never will be satisfied—never will be satisfied without total and complete supremacy. Those who now demand the disestablishment of the Irish Church are they whose forefathers accepted Roman Catholic Emancipation on the condition that permanent safety was to be secured to that Church. I have always felt the greatest sympathy for Ireland. I have Irish blood in my veins. ["Oh, oh!"] I am not aware that that is a circumstance to be ashamed of. I have always supported every concession to the Roman Catholics. I voted for Maynooth, and the night before I stood for my election I was told that if I gave my vote in favour of the grant I should lose my seat. I voted for Roman Catholic chaplains in gaols and in the army; and in spite of the celebrated "Durham letter," when "No Popery" was chalked up and somebody ran away, I was one of the twenty-one Members who resisted the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill. On this very question of the Irish Church I am one of those who have talked loosely. With regard to it I have hitherto felt and said that there appeared to be a great and grievous anomaly; but that it was a question so remote in its nature that it was not likely to come before us in our time. What conclusion must I come to? Why, that I cannot follow the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. And why? Because this is not an Irish question. It goes a great deal farther than that. What is the principle upon which we are called to act! We are two parties in this State, and both of us are bound to do what is best for the interests of Ireland. Both advocate the principle of religious equality. I deny that that principle is in existence in the Constitution. And I further deny that if you follow this principle of religious equality absolutely or necessarily, whether you "level up" or "level down," it leads to one or other of these two conclusions—the repeal of the Union as the total disestablishment of all Established Churches. When I say that, do not mistake me when I say religious equality as it exists in our Constitution—I do not mean religious toleration—that to the fullest extent is indeed the great principle applied by the State to all religions in all parts of the country. Let me take this principle of religious equality—as it binds the Church of this country to the Irish Church—first on the "levelling up" principle. What the "levelling up" principle means I do not understand. We have had no explanation of it; but, so far as I can understand it, it must mean this—sooner or later, in some way or other, the endowment of the Roman Catholic Church, a Roman Catholic University, and the giving a social position and status in Ireland to the Roman Catholic priests, which we should all rejoice to see has already been given to Archbishop Cullen at the Vice regal dinner. Will this go beyond religious equality? Certainly not. Were it a religious equality unless the Roman Catholic Bishop is to sit in the House of Lords as well as the Protestant Bishop? Where is the religious equality of Ireland unless the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is a Roman Catholic? I apprehend it will be consistent with our Constitution. There will be the Roman Catholic Bishops sitting with the English Bishops in the House of

Lord Elcho

Lords, if it is consistent with the present Constitution. Now as to the "levelling down" principle. Will that go beyond religious equality? We know what the "levelling down" principle means, at any rate. It means the total disestablishment of the Irish Church. I maintain that as long as the Union is maintained the total disestablishment of the Irish Church—putting all Churches in that respect on an equality—will not give religious equality to the Roman Catholics in the United Kingdom. It was an argument of the right hon. Gentleman to-night that it was not a question of voluntarism, but a question of the majority of a certain persuasion. What I distinctly maintain is that logically you cannot get out of that position; and that the disestablishment of the Church of Ireland logically means the disestablishment of the Church of England and the Church of Scotland. I know I shall be met with this remark—"That is all very well in theory, but we are practical people. It is expediency." We had that word to-night from a distinguished Member of this Bench—"It is expediency that demands the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and there is not the slightest chance of the Established Church in Scotland or in England following the Church of Ireland." A word upon that. What is it that has brought about the present state of the question? ["Order."] I have no hope that hon. Members on this (the Opposition) side of the House will allow those who are in the minority to give an expression of opinion, especially upon a question respecting a cause which they think is bad. How is the present position of the Irish Church brought about? By three causes. We have here, as it is in America—"Oh, oh!" and "Order!" It has been brought about in this way. You have in this country a Roman Catholic party united as one man; you have here two parties who, without the aid of that Roman Catholic party, cannot maintain their position in this House. I must specify the measures that are resorted to in order to maintain that position; but as in America, at the present time, certain measures are taken in the Presidential election in order to win the Irish vote, so in this country there are certain measures proposed from one side of the House in the hope of gaining the Irish vote. That is one influence at work to bring about this state of things. Another is the power in this country of voluntaryism and the Liberation Society. The House appears to forget that these are days of reconciliation upon this (the Opposition) side of the House, and that this is a general measure of reconciliation. Well, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) is a distinguished member of this powerful Liberation Society.

MR. BRIGHT: I beg to say that I am not a member of the Liberation Society.

LORD ELCHO: I congratulate the hon. Gentleman upon this—that, being one of the most determined opponents of Establishments in this House, he is able to say that he has not joined a society with which he entirely sympathizes. Now, what is the programme of the Liberation Society? ["Question!"] Their programme consists of four parts—church rates, Ireland, Scotland and England. The first of these acts is played out. The second is being played out, and the members of the Liberation Society are too honest, and, indeed, too confident, to deny that they look with something like certainty to the completion of this programme. The other cause which has brought about the present state of things is the exigency of party. Will any man tell me that these causes, which are in force now, will be diminished by the passing of this measure? Does any man doubt that, in the course of a few years, some right hon. Gentleman will get up, and, pointing to some one whom he had previously opposed, will say in reference to the Scotch Church, "Now is the hour! Behold the man!" Am I speaking without book of what is before us? I know there are many Gentleman on this side of the House who, if they thought that by the vote they are about to give they would eventually disestablish the Church in Scotland and in England, would shrink from giving that vote to-night, and I wish to point out to those hon. Gentlemen what is marked out for them by the head of the voluntaries in this country. The aim and end of the voluntary movement was sketched by Mr. Miall ten years ago; and it is clear from what he said that the application of this principle to Ireland will re-act upon the Churches of Scotland and England. Now, I think I am justified in saying that we shall see the same state of things brought about in this country that is now proposed for Ireland. ["Divide!"] I trust the House will pardon me for thus giving expression to my opinions, feeling, as I do, that this is a question to be argued not upon expediency but upon principle; for if argued on expediency, we know not how soon expediency may come to the conclusion that it is desirable to do in Great Britain what you are now doing in Ireland. I hope in the remarks I have made I have said nothing which can give offence to my Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen. I have done all in my power—saving always this great question—to promote their views for the extension of their religious liberty; but when I am asked to give my vote to root up that which has been established for three centuries, when I see that, logically, and, I believe, practically, it will lead to the same results in this country, I regret that I must give my vote against the Motion of my right hon. Friend.

MR. GLADSTONE: I waited, Sir, until the last moment in the expectation that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would address the House, and in the belief that I was acting conformably to usage, as the person who proposed the Resolution that is now before the Committee, in desiring not to offer any remarks that I might feel necessary until the rest of the discussion had been wholly concluded. But as that is not to be so, I take occasion to observe that during this debate, which has ranged over a wide field, and now at the end of the eleventh night—and I, for one, do not grudge the time bestowed upon so important a question—the discussion has turned in general upon accessory and secondary matters, and not upon the merits of the Irish Church itself. But, after all, at this we can hardly wonder, for the case of the Irish Church is simple enough. The hon. Baronet who commenced the debate this evening (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) in a very attractive speech stated, and laid great stress on the statement, that the Irish Church at present exists. Well, Sir, that is an admission to which I attach great importance. It is an admission which we are constrained to make, and I think it is almost the only admission with respect to it that can possibly be made. For when we are asked to show cause for the removal of the Irish Church, assuredly it is enough to say, in recommending that the existence of the institution be brought to its term, that it never has fulfilled—that it is demonstrated it never can fulfil any of the objects for which a religious Establishment is constituted. It is not the Church of the nation, but the Church of a fraction of between one-eighth and one-tenth of the nation. It is not the Church of the poor, for my right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) has just told us that nine-tenths of the land of Ireland is in the hands of its members. It is not a Church supported and propagated by us on the high ground of truth, because, along with the magnificent endowments that we allow to continue in the hands of the Established Church in Ireland, we take care to vote, inconsistently from the public minds of this country, a sum for the support of that College whence go forth the pastors of the Irish people, who receive an education supplied at our expense. It is not even a Church maintained for the support and propagation of the Christian Faith, for it is clearly demonstrated by figures which no man can dispute that for that end it has entirely failed. The Home Secretary, indeed, thinking to pass lightly over this subject, said he knew of no figures except those of the last thirty years; but, whether the right hon. Gentleman chooses to know of them or not, it is an undoubted fact that there are Returns which have always been brought to come from trustworthy persons and persons of authority, such as Sir William Petty. Moreover, as I have told the right hon. Gentleman—and he may satisfy himself if he pleases—that about 40 years ago a careful Census of the religious persuasions of the people of Ireland was made, under the authority of the Government of the day, and that Census, concurring with Sir William Petty and every other investigator, stated the proportion of Roman Catholics to Protestants as much lower than that which now exists after three centuries of Protestant ascendancy. For that purpose, then, does the Irish Church Establishment exist? Not for any of the religious purposes that should consecrate the existence of a religious institution. It exists, unfortunately, for other purposes—for the purpose—I freely admit the merits of its governors and ministers—of keeping alive in Ireland the remembrance of bitter animosities, and for still establishing and maintaining, in a form palpable to the people, the principle of religious inequality and religious ascendancy. It is not wonderful, under these circumstances, that the debates of this year have taken a course very different indeed from those of thirty years ago, and that the defence of the Irish Church has been based mainly and almost entirely upon grounds extraneous to that Church itself. Now, Sir, we have before the House and the Committee—before Parliament and the country—not one policy but two. It is admitted by Her Majesty's Government, as much as by us, that the present state of things cannot be maintained; that, in the face of official responsibility, you cannot confront the people of Ireland and contend that the present condition of religious endowments in Ireland ought to remain unchanged. There is the policy of the Government, which may be said to consist mainly in the first instance of procrastination. Now, that is a policy which in our judgment is, I think I may say, almost inadmissible. We contend—and I shall presently endeavour to show—that if ever there was a moment calling for decisive action on the part of the Legislature, that moment is the present. But, although the policy of procrastination is adopted, the Government have given sufficiently clear indications of the course they would pursue. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has told us—not this year only but last year—in terms not to be mistaken, that we are to create and not to destroy in the matter of religious Establishments in Ireland; while the noble Earl the Chief Secretary, the person next in authority with respect to Irish questions, has stated in terms still more distinct and with more detail, that the Government have no objection to the establishment of religious equality in Ireland, provided that equality be brought about not by taking from the existing Establishment, but by giving to those who receive no public endowments, and by increasing the unworthy and inadequate endowments now enjoyed by the Presbyterians. Thus the policy of the Government is the policy of joint Establishments. I know, indeed, that the notion of paying Roman Catholic priests is disavowed by the right hon. Gentleman. He contemplates more than that. He contemplates a greater solidity of position for them than as the mere stipendiaries of the State; he evidently concurs in the remark of the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo) that equality is to be established not by taking away from those who have, but by giving from the resources of the State to those who have not. Such is the policy of the Government. It was presented to us at the very outset of these discussions by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary (Lord Stanley), and it was presented to us the other night by the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners). The noble Lord (Lord Stanley), whom I have not seen present for a single moment during the later stages of the debate, treated the subject in a manner indicating perfect readiness to deal with the Established Church in Ireland in any way that might be found convenient. By the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works we were assured that Her Majesty's Government only occupied these Benches in order to be of use to the Church Establishment of Ireland, and that the moment they found they could cease to serve its interests there they should withdraw. It was impossible to conceive a more violent contradiction than the contradiction between the whole tone and substance of the speeches of those noble Lords; and I am sure that neither the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works nor anyone who heard those speeches will contradict me when I say that between the speech of that noble Lord and that of the Foreign Secretary who first announced the policy of the Government in this matter, a wider divergence could not exist. But, Sir, the policy of joint Establishment is not admitted even by the followers of the Government. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Colonel Barttelot), who opened the debate on Tuesday evening, avowed at once that for himself and for the generality of those with whom he communicated in his own part of the House he entirely repudiated that policy, and he then went on to lay down a policy, perfectly different in the sketch, of a mode of proceeding which he drew for himself, and which was nothing else but the revival of the old Appropriation Clause. The hon. and gallant Gentleman said that you ought first to provide for the wants of the existing Church Establishment of Ireland, and then to dispose of the surplus property of the Church in some other manner, and that if you gave it to general education it would not be much amiss. That is precisely a revival of the plan of thirty-three years ago, which was then contended for by the Whig and Liberal party, and which was defeated by the Conservative party, and I must say by the public opinion of England; but which as now passed, like many other forgotten and abandoned ideas of the Liberal party, into the hands of hon. Gentlemen opposite. This is the position of the Government: divided among themselves—divided in the whole character and tone of the addresses which they make to the House, and repudiated expressly by important supporters of their own from behind them in respect to that they think essential for Ireland—namely, a departure from the present ground of simply maintaining the Irish Church Establishment, and an attempt to alter, as the right hon. Gentleman called it, the status of the other religious bodies in that country. With respect to those who sit on this side of the House, I must tell my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) that he will in vain address to me a series of questions belonging to the construction of a plan necessarily most elaborate and difficult—and most unfit and improper, in my judgment, to be introduced into this House by any person except the Executive Government of the country. It is from no disrespect to my right hon. Friend that I decline to enter upon an answer to those questions. He is perfectly at liberty to argue as he pleases upon them. I know very well the responsibility which I undertake in the endeavour to move this question. It has not been done lightly; nor shall I shrink from meeting its demands, whatever they may be. But I will not put to hazard what I think are great public interests, nor will I step beyond the limits of the province that belongs to Independent Members of this House, by undertaking that which would be a most arduous task for persons armed with the necessary means of information and authority; but the attempt to undertake which, without those means of information and authority, and before the proper time had come, would be indeed an act of the gravest imprudence. But, Sir, the first object of the policy that we profess is justice to the Irish people—to the whole people of Ireland; but especially, no doubt, to those who are the great majority of the people of that country, and upon whom the burden of all that has been corrupt, and all that has been oppressive in its Government has principally weighed—I mean the Roman Catholic population. But although our policy has for its aim the giving of justice to that country, I must also say it has commended itself to the Protestant opinion of this country. I will venture, as the shortest and simplest way of laying before the Committee the point of view from which it is so regarded, to read a part of a very short Petition from a congregation at Newport, in Pembrokeshire, which I think states, intelligibly and clearly, the view which most thoroughgoing Protestants in the stricter and even narrower sense of the word may take, and is taken, of the Resolutions now before the House. The extract is as follows:—"Your Petitioners"—[An hon. MEMBER: How many signatures?]-I am not going to read the signatures, nor do I rely upon the signatures. There is such a thing as argument, and statement, apart from signatures. It is altogether as a rational statement of opinion I am about to read a part of this petition, and not in the least on the ground of the signatures attached to it. It is as follows:—

Mr. Gladstone

"Your Petitioners are convinced that the maintenance of the Protestant Establishment in Ireland, being in itself a manifest injustice, and a constant source of irritation, has been and still is a great hindrance to the reception of the Protestant Faith by the Irish people. That your Petitioners view with alarm and regret the various concessions to Popery which have been already made in the shape of Maynooth endowments, and the recent proposal of Her Majesty's Ministers to create and endow a new Roman Catholic University in Ireland. That your Petitioners observe that all these concessions to Popery are justified on the ground that they are a kind of set-off against the injustice of maintaining a Protestant Establishment in Ireland. Your Petitioners therefore pray"—

I think very naturally, as the sequence of the considerations they have set forth—

"that your honourable House will take such steps as may be necessary to disestablish and disendow the Established Church in Ireland."

If it were at an earlier period of the evening I should have been desirous to refer to an accusation made against us of coalition or conspiracy amongst certain parties—accusations which proceeded from the right hon. Gentleman under circumstances of a character that made me think it more befitting to pass them by at the moment in silence—but which has assumed a more serious complexion since, in consequence of his having adopted them in a written correspondence. My desire and my temptation is to enter upon that subject and to show that not only that statement of the right hon. Gentleman was not true, but that it was the exact reverse of truth, and that the very persons whom he indicated as favourers of the plan and the policy we have laid before the House were at that moment his own favourers, busy doing everything that could be done to discredit our propositions and to strengthen his hands. With the materials of that proof, I think I am abundantly furnished; but I pass from the subject in consequence of the lateness of the hour. Only this I will say, while we admit the existence of no conspiracy, we claim, I hope—at least I claim—to be in spontaneous concurrence with that party over all the world, by whatever name it may be called, which in any country is endeavouring, for the sake of social justice, to break down the system of religious ascendancy. Perhaps I may be permitted, in illustration of what I have said, to read a passage, not unworthy of the notice of this House, from a speech delivered a few days after our last debate in the Austrian Chamber at Vienna. The House knows that there, as well as here, there is a battle against religious ascendancy; but there the Protestants are in the minority, and are struggling for liberty; here the Roman Catholics are in the minority, and are struggling for equality; but the principle is the same, and the speech to which I refer was delivered by a gentleman who is now endeavouring to obtain by law in the Austrian Chamber, along, I believe, with the great majority of the representatives of the country, the relaxation of the severe restrictions imposed under the recent laws of that country in consequence of the Concordat with Rome. Mr. Kurlter, to judge from the tenour of his speech, is a Liberal Roman Catholic. He says—

Mr. Gladstone

"The Liberal party in England has introduced a Bill into Parliament by which the tyranny of the State Church in Ireland is to be brought to an end."

["Oh!"] Well, Sir, I cannot be surprised that Gentlemen in this House, and particularly Gentlemen on that side of the House, should use their freedom of indulging in audible exhibitions of their dissent from the sentiments of this Austrian speaker. But I wish to point out to them that which has been said before, and that which they may depend upon it is no unimportant element of this controversy—namely, that out of this country, among educated, liberal, and enlightened men, there are not two opinions; there is but one opinion on the great controversy with respect to religious ascendancy between England and Ireland. He continues—

"That party has determined that the Emancipation of the Catholics carried in 1829 should at least become a reality and a truth, and that one further step in advance should be made. It demands that this Church, with its oppressive privileges, that this Established Church—this English State Church, which in Ireland claims rank above the Roman Catholics, should cease to exist. Gentlemen, that is the demand of the Liberal party in England; as the law before us is the demand of the Liberal party in Austria. It is for you to draw the parallel. In England the Roman Catholics, in Austria the Protestants and other minorities are to be relieved. There is the Catholics, here it is the Nonconformists; but the principle is the same."

That is the alliance to which, if it is charged upon us from the other side of the House, we are ready to plead guilty. Now, the objections which have been made to the proposal before the Committee are, in point of fact, mainly two. One of them is founded on the effect which the adoption of the proposal will have upon the Church of England, and the principle of Establishments in general, and the other refers to the time at which the proposal has been introduced. Now with respect to the Church of England. I have not troubled the Committee at any length on former occasions; but I think it right I should hold explicit language on that subject; because I know quite well that if I were to say that this is not the time for its consideration, and that the question of the Church of England was too remote, that would be an insufficient answer. Some years ago—three years ago—and even, perhaps, two years ago, but certainly three years ago—I believed the question of the Irish Church was remote; but that which then made the question of the Church of Ireland appear remote was simply this—that the state of opinion in the English mind was not ripe for its entertainment. No one will find that I ever stated that the case of the Irish Church at that period was not ripe for legislation; but the indifference which pervaded the public mind on the subject was, in my judgment, such that any man who had endeavoured, in a responsible position, even to direct the action of a party against the continuance of the Established Church of Ireland at that time would have been guilty, in point of prudence, of an error calculated to be highly injurious to the public interests. It would not have been an act of prudence to have attempted to deal with the question until a period had arrived at which there was a likelihood of closing it. I feel the responsibility of opening it now; but I have not been backward in bearing my share of the responsibility, because I am convinced that the time has arrived when the hope of closing it is offered to our reasonable expectations. Now, Sir, with respect to the Church of England; I remember very well at the time of the debates on the Ecclesiastical Titles Bill, when I think I last had the opportunity of voting with the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho), that it was stated and felt that the dangers to the Church of England were great and serious. Well, those dangers have continued; but along with her dangers and her divisions have continued also her life, her progress, her increased and increasing efficiency and efficacy in the discharge of her duty, and I own I cannot see how her national foundations, which are sufficiently broad, can be weakened by submitting her to the test of all the principles which go to justify a national Church, every one of which condemns the Church of Ireland. No doubt she has many enemies, and I shall, I know, only draw forth a responsive and sarcastic cheer from the other side of the House, when I say that, unhappily, many of the enemies of the Church of England, though not in intention, are to be found amongst her own friends. Who they are may be matter of dispute between us. I am not one of those who think that because the Church of England is a State Church that it is not therefore the business of those in authority within her borders to make any provision for the increasing exigencies which every day brings upon her, and which can only be satisfied by the exertion of her own voluntary energies. The assailants of the Church of England are various. There is the Liberation Society, which is a perfectly open manner of assault; but she unhappily incurs other dangers. Those men tend to weaken the foundations of the Church of England who push their principles so far as to deprive her of all dignity by forbidding her to be the teacher of a defined and substantive religious system. It seems to me, likewise, that those friends of the Church of England, if they may be so called, greatly weaken her, who are in the habit of picturing her condition, supposing she was deprived of State endowments, as one altogether to be deplored. Sir, it is a satisfaction to me to do an act of justice to an opponent, and I have pleasure in saying that the course I have described has never been pursued by the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government; but there are a class of persons attached to the Church of England who contemplate the change of condition that would carry her over into a state of a voluntary society with feelings of extreme alarm, and they immediately raise most disparaging comparisons as to the moral effect of Establishment and endowment, so that, accepting them as a fair example of what Establishment produces, its result seems to be to emasculate the mind of those who are connected with bodies receiving support from the State, and to deprive such bodies of those better energies which were their own original and indestructible inheritance. Then again I must own that the extravagant claims made upon the part of the Establishment are, in my opinion, among the most effective modes of inflicting injury upon her; threats and menaces have been used regarding measures that have nothing to do with the religion of the Establishment, but touch only its temporal incidents. We have been told, and that not many days ago, with reference to discussions now going on in the walls of this House, that there are 20,000 pulpits in England, and if we do not take care what we are about those 20,000 pulpits will be used for some unknown and undefined but most formidable purpose, and that the day will return which was described by Hudibras—

“When pulpit, drum ecclesiastic,
Was beat with fist instead of a stick.”

I do not know what infatuation—for such it appears to me—induces people in authority or out of authority to believe such things; but I would not undertake to be responsible for the amount of injury which may be inflicted upon the Church of England through these vain and idle imaginations. But it is hardly vainer to assert that upon every sound and rational view there is any ground for saying that the course which we are taking tends to weaken the Church of England. We are attempting to remove what we think a bad Establishment, and to remove a bad Establishment is not to weaken but to strengthen a good one. And now, Sir, will the Committee allow me to read a few words in which I think Lord Russell recently stated the conditions under which, according to the modes of modern thought and feeling, a religious Establishment may fairly, hopefully, and beneficially exist in a country? He says in his second letter to my right hon. Friend—

“It is, in my opinion, a great benefit to a country when it can have its civil government and its prevailing religious opinions in alliance; the State ruling all orders of men in cases spiritual as well as temporal, according to certain articles of belief, and a State form of worship on which the pastors of the Church have come to an agreement with the governors of the State. Nor is it enough that the articles of belief and the form of worship adopted should be those of the sect which is a majority as compared with any other communion; they must be such as are not repugnant to the general sense of the community, such that the minority may be satisfied with their position and unwilling to break in upon the general harmony on account of the Church Establishment. Such has been in its outline the history of the Church of England.”

Mr. Gladstone

I believe that to be the most discriminating and the most judicious delineation of the position the Church Establishment may usefully and beneficially occupy, either in relation to the present tradition of the Church of England or for a very long time to come. But, if I am to be charged with displaying hostility to the Church of England, let me just ask Gentlemen to consider for one moment how many men there are in this House who would venture, supposing there was no difficulty in doing it, to disestablish the Church of England? I presume, of course, if the Church of England were disestablished, that her members must be dealt with upon principles not less favourable than those which there seems to be a general disposition to apply to the Church of Ireland. I am bound to say that Mr. Miall, who has been referred to by the noble Lord (Viscount Galway), is disposed to go to such an extraordinary length in the tenderness and liberality of his dealings with the Church of England in the event of disestablishment—[“Oh, oh!”]—well, but why so impatient? Have you read Mr. Miall? Has that Gentleman who interrupts read Mr. Miall? No, he has not; and yet—

VISCOUNT GALWAY: I know Mr. Miall well; I have heard him in this House, and I know that he is the enemy of all Establishments.

MR. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord has not read Mr. Miall's proposals; but if the noble Lord sets any value upon the information, the principle upon which Mr. Miall proposes to deal with the English Church Establishment are far more liberal than those which I have endeavoured to sketch in the proposal to deal with the the Irish Church Establishment. I will, in one moment, present the view I wish to bring before you. It is, upon any rational calculation, quite plain that the Church of England, if I am to go into regions so visionary to satisfy suspicion—[The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Oh, oh!] The Chancellor of the Exchequer may not consider them visionary. He may be prepared to deal with the question at once, and considering the rapidity with which his political evolutions have been executed on certain occasions, there is very little doubt that he would be prepared. But the effect of the disestablishment of the Established Church, so far as I can estimate it, would be this — It would amount to saying to that Establishment, "You are to go forth free to do what you please; a perfectly organized religious body, with the value of about £80,000,000 or £90,000,000 in your pockets to start with in the world." I believe that would be very nearly the form which, mutatis mutandis, the plan for the disestablishment of the Church of England would assume. But I am not so ambitious, even disclaiming any other grounds, to think of such a plan. Much has been said with respect to the time at which this Motion has been introduced, and that was a point dwelt on by my hon. Friend the senior Member for the University of Oxford (Sir William Heathcote), who treated this subject with a candour, and a fairness and justice of mind which are as conspicuous in him as his sobriety and clearness of judgment. There are, in my opinion, three distinct grounds that marked out the period for dealing with the Church of Ireland, any one of which would have been sufficient to open the opportunity, and by opening the opportunity to constitute the obligation. My hon. Friend seemed to think that it was enough to condemn a proposal such as that now before the Committee, that you could say that it was admitted on the part of the promoters that the subject could not be finally settled and disposed of during the present year. Now, that is no objection whatever to a proposal, that it cannot be finally settled and disposed of during the present year, provided it be true that during the present year some real and effectual progress can be made—that something can be done which, if you do it, will give you a starting-point more advanced next year; whereas, if you do it not, you must begin twelve months hence at the point where you now stand. The state of opinion in this country, in my view, amply justifies the attempt which we are now making. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wigton Burghs (Mr. Young) was entirely misapprehended by some one who understood him to say that this was a measure brought forward to unite the Liberal party. Well, it may be all very well for Gentlemen who sit opposite to say that—that is the charge, and they may believe it or not, as they like. They may assume—or some among them may assume, for I am far from believing it to be the case universally—some of them, I say, may assume, and perhaps it is not unnatural that they should do so, that it is for party purposes that this great public question has been brought forward. But it is one thing for the noble Lord and men of his way of thinking to make that assumption with which, coming as it does from him I can find no fault; and it is another thing to say that admissions have been made by us. We take the liberty respectfully to disclaim having made these admissions. We claim to be guided by the public interests involved in the question. We have done nothing in this matter to make it difficult for the Government, as far as we are concerned, to continue in their offices; but undoubtedly I, for one, have proceeded upon the principle that the interests involved in the condition of Ireland are of such a character and such a magnitude as entirely to throw into the shade any question connected with the continuance in or dismissal from Office of any Government. I certainly will not be the hypocrite to contend that I view the existence of the present Government in many of its Departments with any special satisfaction. But I say that the state of opinion which exhibited itself in that union of the Liberal party, both within this House and through the country to the remotest corners of the three kingdoms, and in spite of the attempts that have been made to import religious bigotry and animosities, go to demonstrate that we have the hearts and minds of the people in our favour with regard to this great question. But it is not that alone; it is the conduct of the Government themselves. I do the Government the justice to say that they themselves opened the question of religious differences in Ireland. Who had asked them to do so? My hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) as an individual. But it was the Government themselves who declared that they had a policy for Ireland, and who, having in the sketching and drawing of that policy told us that it included the ecclesiastical element, put forward, with a strange maladroitness, that extraordinary scheme for a new Roman Catholic University to be charged upon the Exchequer of this country, and then went on to say that they had no objection to a religious equality accomplished through the medium of new endowments. The Government having brought forward this question themselves, are not in a position to find fault with us because we have said that we shall oppose that policy, which we think to be impracticable and mischievous, with a policy of our own, which we believe to be wise and beneficial. But I am bound to say that even if the Government had not done this, and had we been as much divided on this question as I believe we are united, I for one, speaking as an individual, could not look at the state of Ireland in connection with the general security of the Empire, and hesitate to say that I did not see in my own mind how, even independent of the hope of party combination or effectual action, we should have been justified in refraining from pressing our convictions with regard to the Irish Church upon the notice of Parliament. The question of the state of Ireland is one upon which it is difficult to enter or to dwell. How was it treated by the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works (Lord John Manners)? It was the business of the noble Lord to draw a rosy picture, and a rosy picture he drew. He described the Fenian conspiracy as foul, hateful, abominable—so far I am not indisposed to agree with him; but the noble Lord added that it was contemptible, that its existence was now terminated, and that it was terminated by the overwhelming loyalty of the great mass of the people of Ireland. The latter part of that description was in flat contradiction to the official account given us by the noble Earl the Secretary for Ireland. The noble Earl described the feeling of the population of a part of Ireland, and their latent sympathy with Fenianism, in terms that no ingenuity can reconcile with the less-informed and more distorted statement of the First Commissioner of Works. We well know which of those statements is the true one. It suited the purpose of the debate, no doubt, to make out that the condition of Ireland was a satisfactory one. But what is the real state of the case? You have obtained in that country by the exercise of your gigantic power external peace and order, but it is only on the surface. Do you recollect the speech of Sir Robert Peel when he proposed the Maynooth Grant? Do you recollect the comparatively trifling character of the questions that then arose in the relations between Great Britain and America; and do you recollect that, notwithstanding the trifling character of those questions, he told you of the little cloud that was in the western skies, not bigger than a man's hand, but which might grow into gigantic dimensions, and from which the storm might burst? Sir, I am not going to enter into that subject. It is one on which words should be few; but they must find their way to willing minds and hearts. I can only say that, in my opinion, the present state of Ireland, where peace is secured only by the exercise of the overwhelming power of England, and where the Minister tells us—rightly and justly tells us—there exists in a large portion of the country a wide amount of sympathy with Fenianism, and a disposition to join in it on the first emerging hope that it may succeed, is not satisfactory. I am not willing to be responsible for the continuance of that state of things, or to run the risk of our being involved in those conflicts which, though remote, may be possible, till I use every effort in my power to clear the conscience of this country with regard to Ireland, so that, confident in right and justice, this nation may meet with hereditary valour and perseverance whatever exigencies may hereafter arise. Sir, it is time for us to abandon this doctrine of exclusive loyalty secured by exclusive privileges. As to what has been said by my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) in the way of warning to us not to turn into enemies men who have been the nucleus of British feeling and attachment, I protest against the whole of that doctrine. I will recognize no distinction between one class of the population and another, except the distinction of obedience and disobedience to the law. I decline entirely to admit—I deny that you have a right—I mean a moral right—to draw a distinction between this and that religious persuasion; to cover one with privileges and to doom the other to exclusion, in order that the minority may be liable to the reproach of purchased loyalty, while the mass of the people may see themselves condemned to be held in less estimation. This is a policy of which we have had examples enough. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) knows enough of it. He knows it was the old orthodox practice of Downing Street long ago to govern the colonies through knots of men, each of which assumed to itself the glorious appellation of "British party." Some thirty years ago every colony had its British party, and that British party was always in a woeful minority; but whenever it was proposed to legislate in a broad and comprehensive way in the interest of a colony we were told, "Oh, you will ruin the British party." "You will exasperate the men who have been always loyal, and who have adhered to you in all your difficulties"—no doubt they did, for they were the chief instruments in creating them—"and you will fail to conciliate a set of fellows under the influence of demagogues who have always been in opposition to your Government, and who, do what you may, will always continue so." That was the experience of the colonies. Let us apply that experience to the case of Ireland. I always contended that those who call themselves the friends of the Protestants of Ireland do them a gross injustice. We have got this British party in Ireland, unhappily, for their misfortune and for ours. In the colonies we have now a British party. But the British party is not the little knot or clique of former days—it is the whole community. It is in the East, the West, the North, and in the South, and so it will be in Ireland if we do them justice. Apply to your laws, as well as to your administration, the principles of equity and equality, and our British party, instead of disappearing, will unfold and enlarge until it comprises within its borders every sane and intelligent and right-minded man in the country. With the state of Ireland which is now before me—by one stage, and by one stage only, removed from open civil dissension, I, for one—apart from every question with regard to the union of parties or with regard to political expediency as between the sections of this House—can never be responsible, and will not be responsible for its continuance. Our duty here is to strengthen the foundations of the Throne, to consolidate the institutions of the country, and to pursue those glorious ends by means that are not less pure,—namely, by striving to bring about a union of all hearts and minds among the subjects of Her Majesty. Upon that work we have entered, and in the prosecution of it I trust we shall not be arrested. But, Sir, although no attempt has been made in this House to arrest us in the prosecution of that work; yet, unless the ordinary channels of information be singularly insecure, there have been declarations made elsewhere which it is impossible to pass by. We have been told that "elsewhere" these propositions have been laid down—First, it has been said that the Resolutions now before the House of Commons call upon Her Majesty to decline the performance of duties imposed upon Her Majesty in her Executive capacity by Acts of Parliament. Well, that is by much the least important of these accusations, because it happens that there is not a syllable of foundation for it. The Resolutions now before the Committee have not the smallest reference to anything to be done by Her Majesty in her Executive capacity, except simply the concession we pray may be graciously made to us of permission to enter on the consideration of a certain legislative measure with respect to the Church of Ireland. That, therefore, I pass by as an assertion of small importance. The next announcement is that, if this House should think fit to take a certain course, it will produce an irreconcilable hostility between the two Houses of Parliament. Sir, in my opinion, that is neither a wise nor a decorous intimation to be made even by the youngest, even by the least experienced of all the Members of either House of Parliament; and that it should proceed from the quarter to which it is ascribed—that from that quarter is to proceed the gratuitous supposition that something is to be done here which is to produce this irreconcilable hostility—appears to me to betoken a woful aberration of judgment. But, Sir, this is not all—furthermore, a power is set up which is to direct the Government and to direct the Crown in the discharge of their duties; and the Ministers are told that if the House of Commons—not for actual offences that we have committed, but for offences it is supposed we may commit—if the House of Commons pass any Address to Her Majesty in conformity with the Resolutions before us, the duty of Ministers—as they are compassionately informed by this presiding genius—will be to advise Her Majesty to withhold her assent. And then, lastly, supposing that even that should not be found a measure completely successful—supposing any "factious" opposition to Government should appear—that is to say, supposing the majority of the representatives of the people should think it their duty to claim their privileges—the privileges and the powers which are inseparable from them, and which they have inherited from their forefathers as much as any Peers of Parliament have inherited theirs, then Her Majesty's Government are on no account to resign before the year 1869, because an immediate dissolution is impossible, or nearly impossible. Sir, detailed comment on these propositions is not necessary. But I think the right hon. Gentleman opposite knows enough of this House to be aware what effect they will produce upon its mind. One thing I must observe—the whole of these propositions, which I have cited in unexaggerated language, were delivered in the face and hearing of Ministers of the Crown, and by those Ministers of the Crown were either approved or unrebuked. Now, Sir, in these circumstances, though, as I have said, many words are not necessary, a few may be useful; and I, for one, speaking as a Member of Parliament, and not presuming to commit any other man, give fair notice that, in the discharge of those duties which the Constitution assigns to me as a representative of the people, I will not on any conditions consent to receive from “another place” the word of command. Sir, I earnestly hope that the Resolution before the Committee will be accepted by a large and decisive majority. We are engaged in a great and solemn work. We are about to confer, as we, at least, on this side of the House, hope, a great boon on the people of Ireland—yet a boon strictly their due, because strictly confined within the limits of equity and justice. It is a mistake to suppose, Sir, that we ever stated or thought that the settlement of the Church question in Ireland was to be a panacea for the evils of that country. The word has been charged on us, though I know not that it has ever been used by any one among us. We are well aware that the evils of Ireland are inveterate evils. Even in the case of a battle or a conflagration the mischief which a moment may do it may take months or years to repair. But here for centuries perverse ingenuity has been at work to deprave and disturb the social condition and political state of Ireland; and long must be the time, even after the application of the requisite remedies—and in the list of those remedies I admit progress has been made—long. I say, must be the time before the full and happy result which is desired can be obtained. But upon that work we have entered, and in it I trust and believe we shall persevere, asserting that the measure we now contemplate, and the acceptance of which we urge on Parliament, though it may not be the whole of the policy, yet is a vital and essential member of the policy which is needed in order to bring Ireland into the condition of being a great part of the strength and a great part of the glory of this Empire, instead of being, as hitherto, in respects neither few nor small, our danger and our reproach.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the right hon.

Mr. Gladstone

Gentleman, I think, was somewhat unreasonable in expecting that I should have risen to address the Committee, because I am in the recollection of the House that at the time he was preceded by two distinguished Members, and both of whom had spoken at great length—one being no less than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), and both speaking in support of that view of the question which I now rise to support. Nevertheless, in the then state of the debate I was prepared to go to a division, and therefore I do not think that I am at all open to the charge of the right hon. Gentleman. But I have no wish whatever to pursue that point further on this occasion. I rise now only to make a few observations, although there are some remarks made by previous speakers which I cannot altogether pass without notice. And I wish the House to be able to put a clear interpretation upon what we are now going to do. I shall confine my observations to that which is before us—the first Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman in the early part of his speech entered at some length into the consideration of the second and third Resolutions. No doubt that was a very interesting subject. I shall, however, only remark that the interpretation the right hon. Gentleman put upon them was of a more satisfactory kind, so far as I recollect, than hitherto has been accepted by the House, or was prevalent in the country. If, indeed, as the right hon. Gentleman says, all that he desires is that Her Majesty's Ministers should advise Her Majesty to commit to the consideration of this House a measure in which her Prerogative is interested, that was a proposition which I cannot reconcile with the description which the right hon. Gentleman gave us of his Resolutions when he first introduced them—namely, that the object was, to use his own words, “to prevent the creation of any further vested interests.” But, Sir, at this late hour of the night, it is unnecessary for me to dwell further upon that important topic. I should not have touched upon it had not the right hon. Gentleman introduced it in his speech this evening. But I think, before we are called upon to discuss the second and third Resolutions, it would be well if he were to confer with his habitual advisers, and endeavour to arrive at some conclusion more consistent with the declaration made this evening. We object, Sir, to this Motion of the right hon. Gentleman on several grounds. I will only mention the most important, and I will endeavour to express myself in the most condensed form. In the first place, we object to the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland because we think it will be most injurious to Ireland. We believe that such a measure will revive and exasperate all those religious animosities which the wiser legislation of the last thirty years attempted to subdue. The right hon. Gentleman says—and several Members who have spoken have made the same observation—that we have said nothing in defence of the Church of Ireland; but what we complain of is, that you who come forward and propose its destruction really urge nothing against it. [Laughter.] I repeat that observation. I listened this evening to the speech of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper). I do not quote it as remarkably original, but as a representative speech. It represented all the objections made to the Church of Ireland; and what were they? They all concluded with this charge—that the existence of the Church in Ireland is an injustice to the Irish people. That is the charge. Well, I say that is a charge which it is, of course, very difficult to meet; because we naturally, in practical politics, do not think that we advance towards the truth, or towards a solution of difficulties, or towards the establishment of a policy superior to the one which we may have pursued, by dealing only with abstract qualities, with justice or injustice. At the beginning of this century an eminent philosopher wrote a well-known book on the Principles of Political Justice; and Mr. Windham said of that book that when he read it there was not a page to which his heart did not respond; but when he concluded it he came to this conclusion—“That if it were applied to the condition of England it would produce universal confusion and endless anarchy.” So when we are called upon to destroy a great institution in Ireland on the plea that its existence is an injustice to the Irish people—try that plea. Is it an injustice to the whole of the Irish people? Everyone admits that a considerable portion of the Irish people are either in absolute union with this Church, or view it with extreme sympathy. If that is the case, its existence cannot be a complete injustice to the whole of the Irish people; it can only be a case of partial injustice. Well, if it is only a case of partial injustice, everyone must admit that such a question is not susceptible of so easy a solution as the total destruction of an institution on the plea of its absolute injustice to the Irish people. This is the first consideration. The existence of the Irish Church not being an injustice to the whole of the Irish people, its destruction would be an act of injustice to a portion of the people. It would also be an act of injustice to a great portion of Her Majesty's subjects who may not live in Ireland, but who entirely sympathize with the religious principles of that institution. It may be an act of injustice to another and a larger portion of Her Majesty's subjects, who believe in the necessity of preserving the connection between Church and State, and the supremacy of the Sovereign. These are considerations at which, at this late hour in the morning, I only glance, to show how absurd it is to argue a subject of this difficulty and importance upon the broad abstract assertions which hon. Gentlemen opposite have made the material of the debate. Therefore, in the first place, we do oppose this sweeping Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman, because we believe it would be a very great injury to Ireland, and that the plea upon which it is recommended is one which will not bear analysis.

We object to the sweeping Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman on another principal ground—namely, that it will very much shake the security of property. I will now instance a case which has not been put before—and it is something to make an observation which has not been made during so prolonged a debate. So far as I can collect from the speeches of the hon. Gentlemen who have advocated this act of confiscation—because an act of confiscation it is now admitted to be, whatever may be the motive—it is recommended on this ground, that the Church of Ireland has not fulfilled the purposes for which it was instituted. [Opposition Cheers.] I am glad we are agreed on that. But if that be the principle upon which you are founding your new system of confiscation, how can you stop at the Church in Ireland? Are there no other institutions—and very rich institutions too—that do not fulfil the purposes for which they were instituted? Look to the great companies in the City of London. Look to the Fishmongers' Company, or to the Drapers' Company, or to the Company of Merchant Taylors. They have large estates; but the Company of Fishmongers does not fulfil the purposes for which it was instituted. They no longer take care to provide us with fresh fish. The Drapers sell no cloth; and I have often dined with the Merchant Taylors, and I have never, I believe, met my tailor. Yet these are societies in possession of vast estates and in Ireland; and they are societies which have been instituted for particular purposes—that we might have excellent cloth and fish, and that our clothes should be cut in the proper fashion. They do not fulfil any of those purposes; and I want to know, therefore, if you confiscate the property of the Irish Church, on the ground that it does not fulfil the purposes for which it was instituted, on what ground can you oppose the attempt to confiscate the estates of those great guilds and companies? Therefore, we believe that if this Resolution be carried it will aggravate the animosities of the Irish people, and injure Ireland. We regard it as a retrograde act and a retrograde policy. And we believe, too, that if this Resolution be carried you will shake the principle of property throughout the kingdom. We oppose the Resolution, in the third place—omitting many reasons of importance, but of a secondary character—because we believe that the necessary consequence, if this policy be carried into effect in Ireland, will be to make the connection between Church and State in England impossible. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman admits that Mr. Miall, who has been so often quoted in this debate, is an eminent man, and he fairly represents the Liberation Society. Well, Mr. Miall does not for a moment disguise his views on this subject, and it would be impossible for him to do so, because I have here in my hand an extract from the last number of The Nonconformist, and I will briefly refer to Mr. Miall's language, who, I have no doubt, conscientiously holds the opinions he expresses, and desires to propagate them. I wish to show what is the view of the party Mr. Miall represents. He says—

"The Irish Church question will not be finally disposed of before the public mind will be prepared to entertain proposals in reference to the Scotch Kirk and the Church of England. As it has been with one Establishment, so, probably, will it be with others; their time is fixed. An impulse will be given unexpectedly, and from an unexpected quarter. Mr. Gladstone is treading on the verge of a wide region of change."

I am not introducing these remarks for the sake of controversy, nor because I wish to thrust Mr. Miall's name into the debate; but his name having been quoted every night during this discussion, I refer to his remarks as a commentary on the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, that no man sitting in this House can think for a moment of proposing the separation of Church and State in England. I wish to show what the authority you have been referring to thinks in reference to the present proposal. The right hon. Gentleman says, that "Mr. Miall's views are of the mildest character. He would rather enrich than plunder the Church. He is prepared to let them keep £80,000,000 of their property." Now, in my view of the necessity and advantage of the connection between Church and State, I am not reconciled to the change by the information of the right hon. Gentleman that the Church, dissociated from the State, is to be a very rich Church. In the first place, I cannot bring myself to believe that the people of this country would ever consent to the severance of that tie, and at the same time agree that the Church of England should retain the property which it now possesses. It would be an imperium in imperio, which to my mind would render the Government of this country almost certainly difficult, perhaps impossible. Therefore, I think we must dismiss from our minds the notion that any such arrangement could ever be tolerated by a British Parliament. But we may have a very powerful and very disturbing element in our society by means of an Established Church, even without the £80,000,000 which Mr. Miall and the right hon. Gentleman opposite are quite ready to concede to the Church free from its connection with the State. That is exactly the point to which, had the time been more opportune, I should have called the serious consideration of the Committee. Hon. Gentlemen have spoken as if a free Church in a free State were a very progressive act; but it should be remembered that the Church has been free before this; and hitherto those who have preceded us in this country have thought that our civilization was advanced and secured rather by preventing the Church from enjoying that absolute and unrestricted freedom which we are now told will be the source of so many blessings. It was because we wanted something which should save us from what my right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) called "fanatical enthusiasm and sacerdotal tyranny," that the wise men who built up the Realm of England devised the doctrine of the Royal supremacy, which is, in fact, giving the control of ecclesiastical affairs to laymen, and which is, at present, the only security for our religious liberty, and a great security for our civil rights. This is a point which has scarcely been touched upon in this debate, but it is one, I believe, gravely affecting the interests of the people of this country. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has appealed with great confidence to what he describes as the sympathy of public opinion with the policy which he recommends. Sir, he is a very bold man who can, off-hand, or without very laborious pains, decide what is really, on a subject of this grave import, the public opinion of a country like England. It is not to be ascertained in a moment, because it is not formed in a moment. What public opinion is to most individuals is the opinion of the circle in which they move; and we in this political life of ours, who have the advantage of living in at least a considerable circle, have some means, no doubt, of ascertaining what general opinion may be. But we are also apt to be wonderfully warped in our conclusions by the particular sphere of observations in which we habitually exist. But I differ, with diffidence, from the right hon. Gentleman in his estimate of the general feeling of the country on this question. No doubt, if you take rattling articles in newspapers and the conceited conclusions of coteries as public opinion, all is very easy for a public man, whether he be a Minister or a Leader of the Opposition. But when questions of fundamental interest in the Constitution of this country arise, it is not in our power to ascertain what the opinion of a nation like England is in such haste and by such superficial means. I believe that the supremacy of the Sovereign is a doctrine deeply fixed in the convictions and in the conscience of England. The more this subject is agitated the more that principle will come to the surface; and it is upon conclusions like that, and not upon some alleged abuses, local abuses of an institution, that grave questions of this magnitude must be finally decided. Sir, I would willingly have sat down this moment only that would be discourteous to an hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke early in this night's debate, and spoke too at some length. I refer to the hon. Baronet the Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen), who, in an agreeable and clever speech, which I may describe as an amiable invective against myself, offered some very severe but courteous comments on my life and career, and made some observations which I ought perhaps to answer. But there was one which I am particularly desirous of noticing, because it was founded on what I think he will find that I am correct in characterizing as a misconception on his part and on that of his friends. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to be offended because I described some hon. Gentlemen in this House as "Romanists." [Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN: Hear, hear!] And an hon. Gentleman who spoke last night (Mr. Rearden) said that I had given him a nickname because I had called him a "Romanist." I certainly had no intention in using that word, to say anything that should be in the least degree offensive; and I rather think that the hon. Baronet, who has literary acquirements and powers of literary research, will find that he is under a mistake. I myself have read most of the great writers in magno certamine utriusque Ecclesiæ, and I believe I remember the time when the word "Romanist" was first introduced. It was introduced as a phrase of conciliation, because there is another word which is connected with odious associations, and has been for a long time, with the people of this country, which might describe his creed. When the word "Anglican" was introduced early in this debate, adopted for the first time, and repeated every night in the nature of a correlative expression, it naturally occurred to me—as I did not choose to avail myself of a word of which I confess I should not be ashamed were I of that religion—to use the correlative word "Romanist." Therefore I can assure the hon. Baronet that no offence was meant. I will not refer at any length to the observations he has made upon a statement with which I closed my remarks before Easter. I made those remarks advisedly. It is my belief that there is in the English Church a party of extreme opinions, who advocate the disunion of Church and State. I was informed by an authority upon which I place implicit credit, that some leading members of that party had been in habitual communication and combination—I never used the word conspiracy, but I will not fight about words—with those I described as Romanists, and for the rest of the statement, that they were in open confederacy, I leave the House to judge of it for itself from the late division; and when the right hon. Gentleman comes forward with a new policy, proposing, rightly or wrongly, a revolution in the country, the dissevering of the Church from the State, and boasts of the majority with which he can carry it into effect, the House must judge whether, under the circumstances, it was unfair for me to say he represented the combination which I described.

Mr. Disraeli

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, to save the time of the Committee he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 330 ;
Noes 265 : Majority 65.

AYES.

Aoland, T. D.
Adair, H. E.
Agar-Ellis, hon. L. G. F.
Anson, Sir A.
Akroyd, E.
Allen, W. S.
Amberley, Viscount
Andover, Viscount
Anson, hon. Major
Anstruther, Sir R.
Armstrong, R.
Ayrton, A. S.
Aytoan, R. S.
Bagwell, J.
Baines, E.
Barclay, A. C.
Barnes, T.
Barrow, Sir H. W.
Barry, A. H. S.
Barry, C. R.
Bass, A.
Bass, M. T.
Baxter, W. E.
Baxley, T.
Beaumont, H. F.
Beaumont, W. B.
Berkeley, hon. H. F.
Biddulph, M.
Bingham, Lord
Blake, J. A.
Blennerhassett, Sir R.
Bonham-Carter, J.
Bouverie, rt. hon. E. P.
Bowyer, Sir G.
Brady, J.
Brand, rt. hon. H.
Bright, Sir C. T.
Bright, J. (Birmingham)
Bright, J. (Manchester)
Browne, Lord J. T.
Bruce, Lord C.
Bruce, rt. hon. H. A.
Bryan, G. L.
Buller, Sir A. W.
Buller, Sir E. M.
Burke, Viscount
Butler, C. S.
Butler-Johnstone, H. A.
Buxton, C.
Buxton, Sir T. F.
Calcraft, J. H. M.
Calthorpe, hon. F. H. W. G.
Candlish, J.

Cardwell, rt. hon. E.
Carrington, hon. W. H. P.
Carnegie, hon. O.
Carter, S.
Castlereagh, Viscount
Cave, T.
Cavendish, Lord E.
Cavendish, Lord F. O.
Cavendish, Lord G.
Chambers, M.
Chambers, T.
Cheetham, J.
Childers, H. C. E.
Clay, J.
Clement, W. J.
Clinton, Lord A. P.
Clinton, Lord E. P.
Clive, G.
Cogan, rt. hon. W. H. F.
Colebrooke, Sir T. E.
Coleridge, J. D.
Collier, Sir R. P.
Colville, C. R.
Corbally, M. E.
Cowen, J.
Cowper, hon. H. F.
Cowper, rt. hon. W. F.
Craufurd, E. H. J.
Crawford, R. W.
Crossley, Sir F.
Daighish, R.
Davoy R.
Davie, Sir H. R. F.
De La Poer, E.
Denham, hon. G.
Dent, J. D.
Dering, Sir E. C.
Devereux, R. J.
Duke, Sir W.
Dillwyn, L. L.
Dixon, G.
Doulton, F.
Duff, M. E. G.
Duff, R. W.
Dundas, F.
Dunlop, A. C. S. M.
Earle, R. A.
Edwards, C.
Edwards, H.
Enot, Lord
Enfield, Viscount
Erskine, Vice. Ad. J. E.
Esmonde, J.

Evans, T. W.
Ewart, W.
Ewing, H. E. Crum-
Eykyn, R.
Fawcett, H.
Fildes, J.
FitzGerald, rt. hon. Lord
O. A.
FitzPatrick, rt. hon. J. W.
Foley, H. W.
Foljambe, F. J. S.
Fordyce, W. D.
Forster, C.
Forster, W. E.
Fortescue, rt. hon. C. S.
Fortescue, hon. D. F.
Foster, W. O.
French, rt. hon. Colonel
Gaselee, Sergeant S.
Gavin, Major
Gibson, rt. hon. T. M.
Gilpin, O.
Gladstone, rt. hon. W. E.
Gladstone, W. H.
Glyn, G. O.
Goldsmid, Sir F. H.
Goldsmid, J.
Goschen, rt. hon. G. J.
Gower, hon. F. L.
Gower, Lord R.
Graham, W.
Gray, Sir J.
Gregory, W. H.
Grenfell, H. R.
Greville-Nugent, A. W.
F.
Greville-Nugent, Col.
Grey, rt. hon. Sir G.
Grosvenor, Earl
Grosvenor, Lord R.
Grosvenor, Capt. R. W.
Grove, T. F.
Gurnay, S.
Haddfield, G.
Hamilton, E. W. T.
Hankey, T.
Hanmer, Sir J.
Hardcastle, J. A.
Harris, J. D.
Hartington, Marq. of
Hay, Lord J.
Hay, Lord W. M.
Hayter, A. D.
Headlam, rt. hon. T. E.
Henderson, J.
Heneage, E.
Henley, Lord
Herbert, H. A.
Hibbert, J. T.
Hodgkinson, G.
Hodgson, K. D.
Holden, J.
Holland, E.
Horsman, rt. hon. E.
Howard, hon. C. W. G.
Howard, Lord E.
Hughes, T.
Hurst, R. H.
Hutt, rt. hon. Sir W.
Ingham, R.
Jackson, W.
Jardine, R.
Jervoise, Sir J. O.

Johnstone, Sir J.
Kearsley, Captain R.
Kennedy, T.
King, hon. P. J. L.
Kinglake, A. W.
Kinglake, J. A.
Kingscote, Colonel
Kinnaird, hon. A. F.
Labouchere, H.
Laing, S.
Lamont, J.
Lawrence, W.
Lawson, rt. hon. J. A.
Layard, A. H.
Leader, N. P.
Leatham, E. A.
Leatham, W. H.
Lee, W.
Leeman, G.
Lefevre, G. J. S.
Lewis, H.
Locke, J.
Lorne, Marquess of
Lowe, rt. hon. B.
Lusk, A.
Maguire, J. F.
McKenna, Sir J. N.
McLagan, P.
McLaren, D.
Marjoribanks, Sir D. G.
Marshall, W.
Martin, C. W.
Matheson, A.
Melly, G.
Merry, J.
Milbank, F. A.
Mill, J. S.
Miller, W.
Mills, J. R.
Milton, Viscount
Mitchell, A.
Mitchell, T. A.
Moffatt, G.
Moncreiff, rt. hon. J.
Monk, C. J.
Monsell, rt. hon. W.
Moore, C.
More, R. J.
Morris, G.
Morris, W.
Morrison, W.
Murphy, N. D.
Neate, C.
Nicol, J. D.
Norwood, C. M.
O'Beirne, J. L.
O'Brien, Sir P.
O'Donoghue, The
Ogilvy, Sir J.
O'Loughlin, Sir C. M.
Oslow, G.
O'Reilly, M. W.
Osborne, R. B.
Otway, A. J.
Owen, Sir H. O.
Padmore, R.
Paget, T. T.
Pease, J. W.
Peel, A. W.
Peel, J.
Pelham, Lord
Phillips, R. N.
Platt, J.

Pollard-Urquhart, W.
 Portman, hon. W. H. B.
 Potter, E.
 Potter, T. B.
 Power, Sir J.
 Price, R. G.
 Price, W. P.
 Pritchard, J.
 Proby, Lord
 Rawlinson, Sir H.
 Rearden, D. J.
 Rebow, J. G.
 Robartes, T. J. A.
 Robertson, D.
 Roebuck, J. A.
 Rothschild, Baron L. de Rothschild, Baron M. de Rothschild, N. M. de
 Russell, A.
 Russell, F. W.
 Russell, H.
 Russell, Sir W.
 St. Aubyn, J.
 Salomons, Mr. Ald.
 Samuda, J. D'A.
 Samuelson, B.
 Scott, Sir W.
 Seely, C.
 Seymour, A.
 Shafto, R. D.
 Sheridan, H. B.
 Sheridan, R. B.
 Sherriff, A. C.
 Simeon, Sir J.
 Smith, J.
 Smith, J. A.
 Smith, J. B.
 Speirs, A. A.
 Staepoole, W.
 Stanley, hon. W. O.
 Stansfeld, J.
 Stock, O.
 Stone, W. H.

Stuart, Col. Orlington-
 Sullivan, E.
 Sykes, Colonel W. H.
 Synan, E. J.
 Talbot, C. R. M.
 Taylor, P. A.
 Thompson, M. W.
 Tite, W.
 Tomline, G.
 Torrens, W. T. M'C.
 Tracy, hon. C. R. D.
 Hanbury-
 Trevelyan, G. O.
 Vandeleur, Colonel
 Vanderbyl, P.
 Verney, Sir H.
 Vernon, H. F.
 Villiers, rt. hon. O. P.
 Vivian, H. H.
 Vivian, Capt. hn. J. C. W.
 Waldegrave-Leslie, hon.
 G.
 Waring, C.
 Warner, E.
 Watkin, E. W.
 Weguelin, T. M.
 Western, Sir T. B.
 Whalley, G. H.
 Whatman, J.
 Whitbread, S.
 White, hon. Capt. C.
 White, J.
 Whitworth, B.
 Williamson, Sir H.
 Winterbotham, H. S. P.
 Woods, H.
 Wyvill, M.
 Young, G.
 Young, R.

TELLERS.

Glynn, G.
 Adam, W. P.

NOES.

Adderley, rt. hon. C. B.
 Annesley, hon. Col. H.
 Antrobus, E.
 Archdall, Captain M.
 Arkwright, R.
 Baggallay, R.
 Bagge, Sir W.
 Bagnall, C.
 Bailey, C.
 Bailey, Sir J. R.
 Baring, H. B.
 Baring, T.
 Barnett, H.
 Barrington, Viscount
 Barrow, W. H.
 Bateson, Sir T.
 Bathurst, A. A.
 Beach, Sir M. H.
 Beach, W. W. B.
 Beecroft, G. S.
 Bentinck, G. C.
 Benyon, R.
 Beresford, Capt. D. W.
 Pack-
 Bernard, hon. Col. H. B.
 Booth, Sir R. G.
 Bourne, Colonel

Brett, Sir W. B.
 Brooks, R.
 Bruce, Major C.
 Bruce, Sir H. H.
 Bruen, H.
 Buckley, E.
 Burrell, Sir P.
 Capper, C.
 Cartwright, Colonel
 Cave, rt. hon. S.
 Cecil, Lord E. H. B. G.
 Clive, Lt.-Col. hn. G. W.
 Cobbold, J. C.
 Cochrane, A. D. R. W. B.
 Cole, hon. H.
 Cole, hon. J. L.
 Connolly, T.
 Cooper, E. H.
 Corrance, F. S.
 Corry, rt. hon. H. L.
 Courtenay, Viscount
 Cox, W. T.
 Cremorne, Lord
 Cubitt, G.
 Dalkeith, Earl of Davenport, W. B.
 Dawson, R. P.

Dick, F.
 Dimsdale, R.
 Disraeli, rt. hon. B.
 Dowdeswell, W. E.
 Du Cane, C.
 Duncombe, hon. Adml.
 Duncombe, hon. Colonel
 Dutton, hon. R. H.
 Dyke, W. H.
 Dyott, Colonel R.
 Eaton, H. W.
 Eckersley, N.
 Edwards, Sir H.
 Egerton, hon. A. F.
 Egerton, E. C.
 Egerton, Sir P. G.
 Egerton, hon. W.
 Elcho, Lord
 Fane, Lt.-Col. H. H.
 Fane, Colonel J. W.
 Feilden, J.
 Fellowes, E.
 Fergusson, Sir J.
 Finch, G. H.
 Floyer, J.
 Forde, Colonel
 Forester, rt. hon. Gen.
 Freshfield, C. K.
 Gallwey, Sir W. P.
 Galway, Viscount
 Garth, R.
 Getty, S. G.
 Gilpin, Colonel
 Goddard, A. L.
 Goldney, G.
 Gooch, Sir D.
 Goodson, J.
 Gordon, rt. hon. E. S.
 Gore, J. R. O.
 Gore, W. R. O.
 Gorst, J. E.
 Grant, A.
 Graves, S. R.
 Gray, Lieut.-Colonel
 Greenall, G.
 Greene, E.
 Grey, hon. T. de
 Griffith, C. D.
 Guinness, Sir B. L.
 Gurney, rt. hon. R.
 Gwyn, H.
 Hamilton, Lord C.
 Hamilton, Lord C. J.
 Hamilton, I. T.
 Hamilton, Viscount
 Hardy, rt. hon. G.
 Hardy, J.
 Hartley, J.
 Hartopp, E. B.
 Harvey, R. B.
 Harvey, R. J. H.
 Hay, Sir J. C. D.
 Ileathcote, Sir W.
 Henley, rt. hon. J. W.
 Henniker-Major, hon. J.
 M.
 Herbert, rt. hn. Gen. P.
 Hervey, Lord A. H. C.
 Hesketh, Sir T. G.
 Heygate, Sir F. W.
 Hildyard, T. B. T.
 Hodgson, W. N.
 Hogg, Lt.-Colonel J. M.

Holford, R. S.
 Holmesdale, Viscount Hood, Sir A. A.
 Hope, A. J. B. B.
 Hornby, W. H.
 Horsfall, T. B.
 Hotham, Lord
 Howes, E.
 Hubbard, J. G.
 Huddleston, J. W.
 Hunt, rt. hon. G. W.
 Innes, A. C.
 Jervis, Major
 Jolliffe, hon. H. H.
 Karlake, E. K.
 Karlake, Sir J. B.
 Kavanagh, A.
 Kekewich, S. T.
 Kelk, J.
 Kendall, N.
 Kennard, R. W.
 Keown, W.
 King, J. K.
 Knight, F. W.
 Knightley, Sir R.
 Knox, Colonel
 Knox, hon. Colonel S.
 Lacon, Sir E.
 Laird, J.
 Langton, W. G.
 Lanyon, Sir C.
 Lascelles, hn. E. W.
 Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.
 Lefroy, A.
 Legh, Major C.
 Lennox, Lord G. G.
 Lennox, Lord H. G.
 Leslie, C. P.
 Liddell, hon. H. G.
 Lindsay, hon. Col. C.
 Lindsay, Col. R. L.
 Long, R. P.
 Lopes, H. C.
 Lopes, Sir M.
 Lowther, W.
 Lowther, J.
 Mahon, Viscount
 Mainwaring, T.
 Malcolm, J. W.
 Manners, Lord G. J.
 Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.
 Mayo, Earl of Meller, Colonel
 Miles, J. W.
 Mitford, W. T.
 Montagu, rt. hn. Lord R.
 Montgomery, Sir G.
 Mordaunt, Sir C.
 Morgan, hon. Major
 Morgan, O.
 Mowbray, rt. hn. J. R.
 Neeld, Sir J.
 Neville-Grenville, R.
 Newdegate, C. N.
 Newport, Viscount
 North, Colonel
 Northcote, rt. hn. Sir S.
 H.
 O'Neill, hon. E.
 Paget, R. H.
 Pakington, rt. hn. Sir J.
 Palk, Sir L.
 Parker, Major W.

Patten, rt. hon. Col. W.
 Paul, H.
 Peel, rt. hon. General
 Tennant, hon. G. D.
 Percy, Mjr.-Gen. Lord H.
 Powell, F. S.
 Read, C. S.
 Repton, G. W. J.
 Robertson, P. F.
 Royston, Viscount
 Russell, Sir C.
 Sanderson, E.
 Schreiber, C.
 Selater-Booth, G.
 Scourfield, J. H.
 Selwin-Ibbetson, H. J.
 Severns, J. E.
 Seymour, G. H.
 Simonds, W. B.
 Smith, A.
 Smith, S. G.
 Smollett, P. B.
 Somerset, Colonel
 Somerset, E. A.
 Stanhope, J. B.
 Stanley, Lord
 Stanley, hon. F.
 Stirling Maxwell, Sir W.
 Stopford, S. G.
 Stronge, Sir J. M.
 Stuart, Lieut.-Col. W.
 Stucley, Sir G. S.
 Sturt, H. G.
 Start, Lieut.-Col. N.
 Surtees, C. F.
 Surtees, H. E.

Sykes, C.
 Thompson, A. G.
 Thorold, Sir J. H.
 Tollemache, J.
 Torrens, R.
 Treeby, J. W.
 Trevor, Lord A. E. Hill-
 Turner, C.
 Turnor, E.
 Vance, J.
 Verrier, E. W.
 Verner, Sir W.
 Walcott, Admiral
 Walker, Major G. G.
 Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
 Walrond, J. W.
 Walsh, hon. A.
 Warren, rt. hon. R. R.
 Waterhouse, S.
 Welby, W. E.
 Whitmore, H.
 Williams, Colonel
 Williams, F. M.
 Wise, H. C.
 Woodd, B. T.
 Wyld, J.
 Wyndham, hon. H.
 Wyndham, hon. P.
 Wynn, Sir W. W.
 Wynn, C. W. W.
 Wynne, W. R. M.
 Yorke, J. R.

TELLERS.

Taylor, Colonel
 Noel, hon. G. J.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the vote at which the Committee has now arrived has altered the relations between Her Majesty's Government and the present House of Commons; it is, therefore, necessary for us to consider our position. I propose, with the permission of the House, to move that the House, at its rising, adjourn until Monday next.

MR. GLADSTONE: I naturally, in common with other Members of the House, regret very sincerely any obstruction or interference with the general course of business; but I cannot possibly object to the Motion made by the responsible Ministers of the Crown under the circumstances of the case.

MR. DISRAELI then moved that the Chairman report Progress.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that some half-hour since, the Prime Minister announced that the vote of the House had altered the relations between the Executive Government and the present House of Commons, placing an emphasis on "the present House of Commons," and proposed the adjournment of the House until Monday. The appeal for adjournment he could not resist; but to his perfect astonishment he had received a message from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the effect that, although the business of the country was to be suspended until Monday, the Committee on the Irish Church would not stand as the first Order for that Day, but that it was intended to proceed with the Committee on Ways and Means. He (Mr. Gladstone) gave notice, therefore, that he should move on Monday next that the Standing Order which regulated the order of proceeding on Monday should be suspended, and that the Order of the Day for the Committee upon the Established Church of Ireland should take its place. He would, however, ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it was his intention to allow the discussion upon the Irish Church to take precedence of the other business on Monday?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that Ways and Means had been placed on the Paper in the ordinary way. The House could on Monday decide as to the course of business. He moved the adjournment of the House till Monday.

MR. CARDWELL said, that, when the arrangement for Committee on Ways and Means, as the first Order on Monday, was made, it was understood that the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire would be considered that evening.

MR. GLADSTONE asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, whether he would now assent to the consideration of the Resolutions in Committee being the first Order of the Day?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed that when the House met on Monday, it would be competent for the right hon. Gentleman to propose the arrangement he desired.

MR. AYRTON asked how the Government statement could come off on Monday unless the "Irish Church" was put down as the first Order? If it was not so placed there would be a breach of faith on the part of the Government.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought that any settlement of the course of business was immaterial when a statement was to be made by the Premier on Monday.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire had exhibited unnecessary excitement. There had been no engagement, and the request made of the House by his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury was a very natural one under the circumstances.

MR. CHILDERS said, he was of opinion that the "Irish Church" should be placed as the first Order for Monday.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE suggested that the House were only losing time. It would be easy on Monday after the statement of his right hon. Friend to settle the course of business.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he had not expected to find the Government acting in the manner they were doing.

LORD JOHN MANNERS denied that the Government had done anything wrong in the matter.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, that the last man who ought to complain of the time of the House being wasted was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire.

Motion agreed to.

House, at rising, to adjourn till Monday next.

SEA FISHERIES (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. BLAKE, Bill to amend the Laws relative to the Coast and Deep Sea Fisheries of Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. BLAKE, Colonel ANNESLEY, Lord CLAUDE JOHN HAMILTON, and Mr. KAVANAUGH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 101.]

VAGRANT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. PEASE, Bill to amend the Act for punishing idle and disorderly Persons and Rogues and Vagabonds so far as relates to the use of Instruments of Gaming, ordered to be brought in by Mr. PEASE, Mr. ARBOYD, and Mr. LIDDELL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 102.]

House adjourned at Three o'clock' till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, May 1, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Marriages (Frampton Mansel) * (85).

Committee—Petty Sessions and Lock-up Houses * (71).

Report—Petty Sessions and Lock-up Houses * (71).

Third Reading—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries * (58), and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—VICTORIA—THE APPROPRIATION ACT.

POSTPONEMENT OF MOTION.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he had to appeal to the noble Lord opposite (Lord Lyveden) who had given notice—

"To call the Attention of the House to the Correspondence respecting and arising from the Non-enactment of the Appropriation Act in Victoria and the Recall of the Governor of the Colony," to postpone his Motion until some day next week, in consequence of what had taken place last evening in the other House of Parliament.

LORD LYVEDEN said, that although the Motion he intended to submit was not of a party character, he should not hesitate to comply with the noble Earl's request. He should therefore postpone it till Friday next. But at the same time he must express a hope that the noble Duke the Secretary of State for the Colonies would not take any action relating to the subject before the discussion.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, he did not think that it would be right for him to give any engagement in reference to the course which he might think fit to take should any circumstances arise which, in his opinion, called for the action of the Secretary of State; but he could assure the noble Lord that it was not likely that anything could arise before the discussion which would affect the question in one way or the other. The last mail brought nothing which called for an answer, and he was not aware that it was likely that there would be any communication from the Government to the Colony before the time when this discussion was arranged to come on. With regard to the question itself, he would say that he believed there was not, nor ever had been any difference of opinion between the Government and the noble Lord with regard to the impropriety of such a grant as that which had been proposed; nor did he believe that there would be any difference of opinion in their Lordships' House. No doubt there might be difference of opinion as to the course which should be pursued; and upon that matter it was quite right that there should be discussion.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH.—THE QUEEN'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD OF THE HOUSEHOLD (The Earl of TANKERVILLE) reported Her Majesty's most gracious Answer to the Address of Monday last, as follows :—

"I receive with deep satisfaction your sympathising address. The attempt upon the life of my son, the Duke of Edinburgh, has I feel only further aroused the loyalty of my Australian subjects, so heartily displayed in his reception. I am very sensible of the Divine protection afforded him, and in my anxiety still trust in it; while in this as in all trials I derive consolation and support from the affectionate attachment of my Parliament and People."

THE PUBLIC OFFICES—NEW INDIA AND FOREIGN OFFICES.—QUESTION.

LORD REDESDALE moved for—

"Return of the Cost of making and erecting Four Statues recently placed against the Pilasters at the South-west Angle of the India Office, and the Cost of the decorative Painting of the Interiors of the India and Foreign Offices: And to ask, Whether it is intended to allow the East Front of the new Offices on the South Side of Downing Street to be completed on a Line which will render the Demolition of the Front of the present Government Offices in Whitehall necessary, or to require it to be so constructed as to form a handsome Elevation in connexion with those Buildings?"

The noble Lord expressed his regret that the Government had this year taken so small a Vote as £10,000 to proceed with these works, and added that it was of great importance that the building should be quickly proceeded with. The appearance of the waste ground there at present greatly disfigured the locality. With respect to the statues on the exterior, those in the niches, he understood, were intended to represent Governors General; he might possibly have made out one or two, and perhaps some might be able to detect a likeness; but he could not consider them particularly ornamental. The statues to which his notice referred appeared to be female figures, and they might represent the cities of India; but they were quite uncalled for and far from being ornamental. It would have been much better that the money which they cost should have been applied in completing the building, which he thought was a matter of very great importance. The same observation applied to the large sum of money that had been expended on the interior decorations. There was another point which appeared to have been very little attended to, and was likely, therefore, to lead to a very unsatisfactory result—he alluded to the manner in which the buildings were being carried out in connection with the existing frontage of those in Whitehall. That row of buildings as altered by the designs of Sir Charles Barry presented a very handsome elevation; but it stood on a different line from that of the new offices, and it would require skilful arrangement to connect the new buildings when completed with those already erected. It had been contemplated by the architect that the existing buildings should be pulled down; but, considering the time it took to erect buildings for public offices, it was extremely desirable that those now erected should be rendered available. Any design which might be adopted should be carried out in a manner to secure the ultimate arrangement of these buildings and the widening of Parliament Street in the most efficient manner. Nothing but a design having for its object to connect all the buildings already erected and those about to be erected would lead to a satisfactory result. He regretted that he was frequently obliged to call their Lordships' attention to this subject, and he also felt sorry that all the land necessary for the purposes of these offices had not been purchased some time ago; for he believed that the longer the purchase was delayed the greater would be the sum required to be paid.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that, on one point, he could set the mind of his noble Friend at ease, for the cost of the statues to which he referred was only £847, and the cost of the decorative painting of the interior of the India Office was about £190. He had no objection to lay before the House a Return showing the expense of painting and decorating the interiors of both the India Office and Foreign Office. A general scheme was in contemplation for concentrating the public offices. A Report on the subject, which had been transmitted to the Treasury, would be very soon laid before Parliament, when the whole plan would be explained.

LORD TAUNTON desired to refer to the statues recently placed in Westminster Hall, and said, that, if anything could tend to vulgarize that noble building, it would be the erection of such statues as now stood in the Hall. A Member of the House of Commons had suggested the addition of the statue of Oliver Cromwell to the statues now standing there; but, in his opinion, the best thing to do would be to take away all the present statues.

LORD REDESDALE said, that, if the cost of the four statues at the India Office was £800, or £200 for each, an expenditure of £8,000 would be required for the whole number of forty statues which were intended to be erected. He thought it would be much better to add that sum of £8,000 to the amount required to be expended for the commencement of the new buildings. The statues were positively unsightly, and, in respect to position, contrary to every principle of architecture.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL—(No. 43.)
(The Earl of Lichfield.)

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD stated that he had agreed, at the request of the Government, to postpone the Motion for Second Reading until next week, and begged to correct a misconception respecting the 3rd clause. That clause would in no way interfere with the power given by previous Acts of Parliament to members of friendly societies to insure the lives of their own children. It simply prevented the children becoming members before the age of seven. In reply to a suggestion from a noble Lord on the other side, he begged to say that he was most ready to consent to the Bill being referred to a Select Committee; but upon the understanding that the Committee should confine itself strictly to the clauses of the Bill. He also begged to announce that he intended to move for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the subject of the insurances of friendly societies in general, more especially with reference to burial societies. He was perfectly persuaded in his own mind that nothing short of a Commission would bring before the public what was going on amongst the working classes, in respect to those insurance offices and companies. In this Bill, he only dealt with the class of societies now registered under an Act of Parliament as friendly societies; but he was aware that a great deal of evil exists in some of those that are unregistered.

Second Reading put off to Tuesday next.

PUBLIC PETITIONS.

Ordered, That the Name of the Lord presenting a Petition shall be written thereon.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, May 4, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—
Metropolis Subways * (73).
Committee—Regulation of Railways * (84); Mar- riages (Frampton Mansel) * (85).
Report—Regulation of Railways * (84-88); Mar- riages (Frampton Mansel) * (85).
Third Reading—Petty Sessions and Look-up
Houses * (71), and passed.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT — DEFEAT
OF THE GOVERNMENT ON THE IRISH
CHURCH RESOLUTIONS.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, your Lordships will naturally be anxious to know what course Her Majesty's Government have thought it right to take after the division which occurred in the other House of Parliament on Friday morning. I have, therefore, to inform your Lordships that on Friday afternoon Her Majesty was most graciously pleased to give the Prime Minister an audience. At that audience the Prime Minister thought it his duty to begin by informing Her Majesty of what had taken place in the House of Commons; and, after reminding Her Majesty of the circumstances under which the late Government was formed under the Earl of Derby, and also of the circumstances under which the present Parliament was called together, the Prime Minister stated to Her Majesty that he thought her advisers were, by constitutional precedent, justified in asking Her Majesty for a dissolution of Parliament. But he added that, if Her Majesty thought that, under the present exceptional circumstances of public affairs, it were more desirable for the country that Her Majesty should call upon other servants for advice, her present Ministers were ready to tender their resignations to Her Majesty, and they did actually tender them for Her Majesty's acceptance if Her Majesty so pleased. Her Majesty said that she would take this advice and statement into her consideration: and accordingly on the next day she was pleased to give the Prime Minister another audience. At that audience Her Majesty was graciously pleased to say that she would not accept the resignation of her Ministers, and that she was ready to dissolve Parliament whenever the state of public affairs would permit.

Afterwards—

EARL GREY: My Lords, before the House is adjourned, I should wish to make a single observation upon the explanation we have just heard from the noble Lord who represents her Majesty's Government in this House. So far as I understand it I cannot acquiesce in what has fallen from that noble Lord. It would seem that an almost unprecedented state of affairs has come upon us, and—without venturing to express any opinion as to what is the present state of public opinion throughout the country—I beg to say that, for my own part, I do not wish it to be considered that I am committed to anything like an acquiescence in the propriety of the course which it appears is about to be pursued by Her Majesty's Ministers. The noble Earl stated that Her Majesty's Government, on being defeated in the other House of Parliament had, according to constitutional precedent, a right to ask the Crown for a dissolution of Parliament. I must beg to protest against that doctrine. What we used in former times to hear was this—that, when there was strong reason to believe that the House of Commons had misrepresented the feeling of the country, it was open to Ministers to appeal to the country in order to ascertain whether that feeling had or had not been rightly represented by the House of Commons; but that unless there existed strong grounds for believing that such a difference of opinion existed, the opinion expressed by the House of Commons must be considered to be that of the country. The noble Earl whom I see sitting opposite me (the Earl of Derby) will remember that this was the doctrine which was held in 1831 with regard to the dissolution of Parliament upon the question of Reform; and that the then head of the Government never concealed his opinion that that was a measure which, in his opinion, he should not have been justified in recommending, had he not felt assured that the course he proposed to pursue would be ratified by the decision of the nation—in fact, he considered that he would only be justified in taking such a course by success. I wish to make these general observations on the constitutional principle, as I do not believe that the mere fact of the Government being defeated is in itself a justification for an appeal to the country.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I cannot help thinking that the noble Earl who has just sat down has somewhat misunderstood the statement which my noble Friend made to your Lordships. My noble Friend was careful to point out that the advice tendered to the Crown by the Prime Minister was based, among other things, by the circumstances under which the present Parliament was elected. If your Lordships will carry back your recollection you will remember that the present Parliament was elected in 1865, at the time when the late Lord Palmerston was Prime Minister. Your Lordships will agree with me that, without entering into any argument as to the merits or demerits of the great question which has lately occupied the House of Commons, a more important one at no time ever engaged its attention. What was the issue presented to the country at the time the Parliament of 1865 was elected? Was the country at that time asked by the noble Lord who was then Prime Minister to express its opinion with regard to the disestablishment of the Irish Church? So far from that being the case only a short year or two years before the dissolution, Lord Palmerston, through the Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, one of his subordinate Ministers, declared in the House of Commons that so far as he was concerned no consent to any measure of that kind would be given. I speak, my Lords, from recollection of the words which I myself heard Sir Robert Peel, when Chief Secretary of the Lord Lieutenant, use, when he said he spoke in his own behalf and on the part of the first Minister of the Crown. It was under these circumstances that the country was asked to elect new representatives in 1865. We may entertain among ourselves opinions which may differ as to what view will now be taken by the country on this question; but in this all will agree, that, under such circumstances, the Parliament which was elected in 1865 is not a Parliament from which the opinion of the country can fairly be elicited; and that there should be an express appeal to the country on an issue of this kind.

EARL GREY: I must confess the noble and learned Lord has rather added to my astonishment than diminished it by what he has said. For what does it come to? It comes to this—that the country is to decide upon every particular measure; and that, because this particular measure was not under consideration when the present Parliament was elected, therefore it is not competent to the present Parliament to deal with it. The very same thing might have been said, if there was any force in the argument, with reference to Reform. When the Parliament of 1830 was elected the great question which was afterwards brought before it had attracted but very slight attention ; for it was the Revolution in France which first laid serious ground for public opinion. The argument used would have applied as much to that occasion as to the present. Further, it has always been held that what the country is to decide upon is the confidence to be placed in certain persons as their representatives, and having elected these persons, it is the duty of such representatives to exercise their judgment upon the measures brought before them. The House of Commons is not a meeting of delegates, but of persons authorised to exercise their own judgment and discretion on the great questions which concern the interests of the country. To say that Parliament is not competent to settle a question because it was not under consideration when that Parliament was elected, is, in point of fact, to say that Parliament is a mere assemblage of delegates, who can only express on each question the feeling of their constituents, and not a body elected to exercise their deliberate judgment on the questions which come before them. Such a doctrine is totally at variance with the opinion of our greatest statesmen, and it is one from which I, for one, entirely dissent.

The Earl of Malmesbury

THE LORD CHANCELLOR : The noble Earl has put into my mouth expressions which I never used. I did not say that Parliament was not competent to deal with the question ; what I did say was that a vote on a subject of great national importance arrived at by a Parliament elected under circumstances which I endeavoured to describe, offered exactly one of those occasions on which the Government of the Sovereign, in the exercise of their constitutional right might fairly tender to the Sovereign that advice which on this occasion has been given.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET : I think, my Lords, it must be admitted that this discussion in the House of Lords is somewhat anomalous. We are now waiting to know what the House of Commons think of the present state of affairs. So far as I can understand, the Government gives no decisive opinion on the subject. The Government are in a minority in the House of Commons, and under such circumstances the usual course is either to resign or to appeal to the country. I am perfectly aware of all the difficulties of the case. The Government say if they at once make an appeal to the country it will involve the necessity of a second dissolution within a very short period. Do Her Majesty's Government mean to appeal to the country at once, or only so soon as the state of public business will allow them ? Is the appeal to be put off until next February ? because, if so, Parliament would be in this position—We have two Reform Bills before us which are necessary to a dissolution—is the Government in a position to carry those measures through Parliament ? Or is it, on the other hand, intended that, as soon as the money necessary to carry on the business of the country has been voted, Parliament will be dissolved ? I should like, if possible, to know what course the Government means to adopt.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND : I can assure the noble Duke that the Government have made up their minds very distinctly on this matter, and I cannot help thinking that the noble Duke was absent when my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal made his statement to the House. Had the noble Duke been present he would not have made the remarks he has just made. I can only recapitulate to the noble Duke imperfectly what my noble Friend stated so clearly as to the position of affairs at this moment. The Prime Minister, on the part of his Colleagues, tendered to his Sovereign the resignation of their offices on Friday afternoon. Her Majesty took time to consider the matter, and received the Prime Minister again in audience on Saturday. Her Majesty expressed her unwillingness to accept the resignation of office tendered by the Prime Minister ; and the result is that we still occupy the same position we did before, and intend to conduct the affairs of the country so long as we are able to do so ; and in the event of any difficulties arising Her Majesty was graciously pleased to state that she would make no objection to a dissolution of Parliament. It, of course, will depend upon the state of affairs whether that dissolution shall be a dissolution under the existing constituency, or whether it shall be a dissolution under the new constituency to be formed under the Reform Acts ; but Her Majesty was graciously pleased to state that she would make no objection to either course being adopted by her Advisers whenever they should see fit to tender to Her Majesty a recommendation on that subject.

LORD FEVERSHAM: My Lords, I must express my satisfaction that Her Majesty's Advisers have not resigned their offices; for I cannot disguise from myself that, owing to the course pursued by the Opposition during the present Session, a fair and reasonable opportunity of carrying on the business of the country has not been afforded to the Government. It was a most extraordinary circumstance that the very first night the present Prime Minister went down to the other House of Parliament to assume the reins of Government—on which occasion he was received on both sides with marks of cordiality and warmth—the noble Earl (Earl Russell) who is not now in his place, thought it becoming to deliver a most uncalled-for and bitter attack upon my right hon. Friend. Before the Government had actually been arranged, or the distribution of offices settled, the noble Earl came down and made that most unjustifiable attack on the First Minister of the Crown. The Ministerial party no doubt regret very much the loss which the country must sustain by the retirement of the noble Earl (the Earl of Derby); but it was clear from the long and distinguished services of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli), from the way in which he has raised himself by his own abilities, energy, and industry, to the head of his party in the House of Commons, he must naturally succeed to the office of First Minister when the noble Earl resigned. The least which the Prime Minister might have expected from Parliament was fair play, and that he has not received. After the adoption in last Session of the important measure of Parliamentary Reform, it was obvious that the necessary business of the present Session was to complete that great work by passing the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, supplemented by the Boundary and Bribery Bills. Surely that business, in addition to the ordinary work carried on in every Session, was sufficient to occupy one Session of a moribund Parliament; and yet the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), without notice, came forward with this question of the Irish Church, which up to that moment had never been heard of. The Parliament and country were, therefore, taken by surprise. I must, however, say that the noble Earl (Earl Grey) opposite, and another noble Earl not at present in his place, having raised the war-cry on that question, now, when they see the difficulties and the crisis which have arisen, make every excuse for the course they pursued. Then, may it not be said that an unfair advantage has been taken of the Ministry in bringing forward this question of the Irish Church at the present peculiar time, when it is so difficult to test the sense of the country? But if I know anything of the practice of Parliament, all I can say is, that an Administration placed in a minority in a Parliament not their own, have the undoubted privilege of appealing to the constituencies. Here, however, is a question brought forward at a time so inopportune that it is most difficult to deal with it in the usual way. I am rejoiced that the Government will not yield up their offices in consequence of the unworthy and unjustifiable attack that has been made upon them; and I challenge noble Lords on the Opposition Benches to say whether the Administration of this country has not been conducted with ability and success. I challenge them to say whether they can find fault with the Administration of the Government in any of the great Departments of the State? Can they find fault with the administration of affairs in reference to Ireland or in respect to the domestic concerns of this country? The able manner in which the foreign affairs of the country have been carried on merit entire commendation; and it redounds to the credit of the Government that they have brought the Abyssinian War to such a successful termination. Under these circumstances, it would be highly inexpedient and unusual if Her Majesty's Advisers were to resign their offices without making an appeal to the country on so great a question as this of the Irish Church; and I believe that the Protestant feeling of the country will be found opposed to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. However, I trust that, after what has occurred, the Opposition will see the error of their ways, and will not persist in that reckless and extraordinary course they have pursued on this question. Depend upon it, it will be better for all parties to allow the ordinary business of the Session to be carried on, and to complete the great work of Reform; for nothing can be more important than to complete that great constitutional change upon which the future representation of the people is to be based.

House adjourned at Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

The Duke of Richmond

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, May 4, 1868.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBERS SWORN—John Ramsay, esquire, for Stirling District of Burghs; Viscount Ingestre, for Stamford; Edward Leigh Pemberton the younger, esquire, for Kent (Eastern Division).
WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.
PUBLIC BILL—Ordered—Poor Law (Ireland) Amendment.*
First Reading—Poor Law (Ireland) Amendment* [103].

TAXATION OF CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, What are the intentions of the Government with respect to the introduction of a Bill to exempt Hospitals, Sunday Schools (whether annexed to places of worship or otherwise), and other schools and charitable institutions generally from Poor's and other rates?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the vote at which the House arrived the other night on the Motion of the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) has very much affected the position of the question with respect to charities; and I shall be obliged to the hon. Gentleman if, upon a subsequent occasion, he will repeat the Question. In the meantime I will endeavour to communicate to him the information he seeks as soon as I am in a position to do so.

NAVY—RETIRED OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN MACKINNON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, If any measure is contemplated to remedy the grievances of retired Officers of the Navy, especially those under the head of H. I. K., who complain of unjust treatment; First. in compulsory retirement; Secondly. Refusing to admit them to the benefits of other retired Captains and Commanders for length of service as awarded to all others?

MR. CORRY said, in reply, the hon. and gallant Member was mistaken in supposing that the retirement of the Officers in question was compulsory. The conditions offered to them were distinctly specified in the Orders in Council which constituted the list, and the Admiralty had no intention of altering the present arrangement.

COUNTY FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS.

QUESTION

SIR WILLIAM GALLWEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When he proposes to nominate the Select Committee on County Financial Arrangements?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he hoped shortly to proceed with the arrangements.

DUKE OF EDINBURGH—

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

Answer to Address [27th April] reported, as follows:—

I receive with deep satisfaction your sympathizing Address.

The attempt upon the life of My Son, the Duke of Edinburgh, has, I feel sure, only further aroused the loyalty of My Australian Subjects, so heartily displayed in His reception.

I am very sensible of the Divine Protection afforded Him; and in My anxiety still trust in it; while in this, as in all trials, I derive consolation and support from the affectionate attachment of My Parliament and People.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT—DEFEAT OF THE GOVERNMENT ON THE IRISH CHURCH RESOLUTIONS.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, after the division on Thursday night, I mentioned that, in our opinion, it altered the relations between Her Majesty's Government and the House, and that it would be necessary for them to consider their position; and with that view I asked the consent of the House to an adjournment for some few days. I now ask further permission from the House to make a short statement on the subject, to give them the result of the consideration of our position, and to state the course which, in consequence, we think it our duty to pursue. I believe I am trespassing on the strict rules of the House in making a statement of this kind without a Motion, but these are rare occasions, and I am sure I can trust to the indulgence of the House. The House will recollect that when, in 1866, the Earl of Derby was summoned by the Queen to take the management of affairs, his party was in a very considerable minority in this House, which was elected under the auspices and at the appeal of his political opponents. It was, therefore, quite open then to the Earl of Derby, in the spirit of the Constitution, to recommend Her Majesty to dissolve this Parliament; and it is possible that, considering the somewhat distracted state of the Liberal party at that moment and the general anxiety which prevailed to support a Government with some principle of cohesion, that the appeal might not have been made in vain. But the Earl of Derby recollected that this Parliament itself was then but recently elected, and there were other reasons of gravity and principle, which induced him to hope that he might be able to carry on affairs with the present Parliament, and therefore he waived what has been considered a constitutional right upon that occasion. The next year, 1867, the Government of the Earl of Derby found itself called upon to meet one of the most difficult and important questions of modern times—namely, the Reform of this House—one which had baffled all statesmen and had broken up and discomfited all parties. Nevertheless, the Government of the Earl of Derby attempted, and attempted successfully, to deal with that question, and they passed a measure which all must admit to have been large in its conception and provisions, and which, I believe, has given very general satisfaction to the country. At the close of the year, after the passing of such a measure, it would have been the Earl of Derby's wish to advise Her Majesty to dissolve this Parliament—a right which he had waived in the first instance—and to take the opinion of the country upon his conduct and that of his Colleagues in carrying this large measure of Reform. But the House is aware that the Earl of Derby was prevented from taking that course, because, notwithstanding the efforts of the Government and the equal efforts of this House, there were certain supplementary measures connected with the settlement of the Reform question which it was really impossible to pass last year. But all these measures, in principle, were accepted, and adopted last year; and, accordingly, there was a fair prospect that, under these circumstances, the Earl of Derby having completed the measure of Parliamentary Reform, and carried all the other measures that were absolutely necessary for the good government of the country, might have had, at the close of this Session the advantage of that appeal to the country which he believed he had fairly earned. The Earl of Derby having waived, what was not strictly perhaps, though practically it had been held to be, the constitutional right of a Minister upon taking office, to advise the Crown to dissolve a Parliament elected under the influence of his political opponents; having waived that right at the end of 1866; and the course of circumstances having again prevented him from availing himself of that right at the end of 1867,—The Earl of Derby, I say, felt that he was placed, unintentionally, of course, by any one, but still inevitably, in a position of some unfairness, and regretted that he had not had the opportunity which, I think, all must admit he might legitimately have expected to enjoy.

Mr. Disraeli

I will ask the House to permit me succinctly to inquire whether, in the administration of the country by the Government of the Earl of Derby, and during the period in which I have had some influence in affairs, anything has occurred to derogate from the effect which the exercise of such a constitutional right under our advice might have been expected to produce? Sir, I am most anxious, on this occasion, to use no expression which can for a moment be considered in the slightest degree coloured; and I would speak, if I could, on an occasion so critical as the present, with the judicial accuracy of the Bench. But I think I may say, speaking in the hearing, I hope, of fair, though I know of vigilant critics, that during the period we have so held Office the conduct of our administration in no important branch was ever impugned. I think I may even go further. Not only was the conduct of no important branch of our administration ever impugned during that period, but our administration in every branch was supported by this House, and commended even by our opponents. I will take, notably, the administration of Ireland, that being the country the proposed legislation respecting which has brought about the present political crisis. It is on record that the Leader of the Opposition, Earl Russell, has on more than one occasion, and in the most marked manner, expressed his entire approbation of the administration of Ireland under the Marquess of Abercorn. He has congratulated the Earl of Derby on possessing such a Colleague; and he has publicly in Ireland announced that, under the Viceroyalty of Lord Abercorn, the Irish enjoy an impartial administration of justice. It will be remembered that the administration of Ireland has been conducted under the most difficult and trying circumstances; and, speaking in the presence of many Irish Members of great ability, of long acquaintance with Parliamentary matters, and of extreme vigilance as to the conduct of Ministers, I appeal to their recollection whether, during the whole period of our administration, the conduct of the Government in Ireland has not always been spoken of with respect and sympathy by hon. Members opposite? That administration has been acknowledged by many of those hon. Members to have been a firm and successful, but, at the same time, a lenient and merciful administration. If we look to the administration of our own home affairs, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had to cope with that dark and fell conspiracy which infested Ireland, without the advantages which the Marquess of Abercorn possessed in the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act as an instrument by which he might baffle the intrigues of foreigners. Yet I think it has been generally and generously admitted in this House, and I believe also in the country, that my right hon. Friend met these difficult circumstances with great firmness, with unceasing vigilance, and with complete success. If we look to our financial measures, not one of them has been questioned or opposed; and I must acknowledge that those which I myself brought forward were supported, generously supported, by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. So much for our Government of Ireland and for our administration of home affairs and of finance. I now come to the greatest Department of the State, one, which perhaps, is brought less prominently before this House than others—but which, after all, more than any other affects the prosperity of this country. Upon the judicious management of our foreign affairs depends peace or war; the tranquil pursuits of industry, and the amount of taxation which must be levied in the country. For by a single blunder in the conduct of our foreign affairs the most provident arrangement of finances ever planned may in a moment be cancelled and destroyed. Just before the House adjourned for the holidays the conduct of my noble Friend the Secretary of State in the affairs of Turkey was attacked in the other House of Parliament with some acrimony. The conduct of my noble Friend was triumphantly defended on that occasion, and by whom? By the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition! He himself had been Foreign Secretary, was cognizant, therefore, of the merits of the case; and he vindicated in a complete manner and gave his entire approval to the management of the Turkish question by my noble Friend. Allow me to say that foreign affairs, although they have not been much brought before the House, have been in a very critical state during almost the whole time that we have been in Office; and I claim for my noble Friend that by his judgment and by his great ability he has kept this country clear from very perplexing difficulties. Well, Sir, what happened with regard to affairs in Turkey really has happened with regard to all our other external relations in the most important parts of the world during the greater period of the time we have conducted the Government of this country. They have been in a state of great tension, requiring perfect temper, calm judgment, conciliatory manners, and a clear conception of the interests of this country. But I need not dwell upon this subject, because if I were to call witnesses in favour of the administration of our foreign affairs, by the present Government, they would be found on the Benches opposite; for those affairs have never been brought under the consideration of this House without the warmest and most generous attestations of the judgment and skill of my noble Friend, notably in the case of a prospect of a collision between France and Prussia, which terrified the civilized world, and, notably, also, in the management of our relations with the great trans-Atlantic Republic, which when we acceded to office were in a state far from satisfactory; but which I can say now promise to realize the best expectations which statesmen can indulge in. Indeed, if it had not been for those unfortunate domestic misunderstandings which have prevailed and have diverted the attention of the public men of America from other duties, we have had on more than one occasion recently a very probable prospect of a settlement of those questions which had perplexed our predecessors, and been a source of great anxiety. Sir, I will say, also, that at no period within my recollection has the influence of England been greater on the Continent of Europe than it is at the present moment; and that not by busy, intermeddling—not by thrusting our opinions on other Powers—but by a conviction on their part that the Government of this country is animated only by justice, by a sincere desire to maintain peace, and by an anxious wish to conciliate other Powers by a fair and not obtrusive sympathy. The consequence has been that, though the Government was established on a liberal but clear basis of non-interference, I believe that no Government, during the period that it has been in power, has been applied to more frequently by all the Great Powers of Europe for its friendly offices and to exercise its influence than the present one.

Now, Sir, in the management of our foreign affairs there was one subject which occasioned my noble Friend—avowedly a lover of peace, and, as all know, a most cautious Minister—the utmost anxiety. That was the state of affairs we found in Abyssinia, our relations with which country were of so painful and perplexing a kind that my noble Friend, after great hesitation and deep reflection, felt it his duty to call the attention of the Cabinet to that state of affairs, as one that could not longer be tolerated, and which for the credit of this country ought to be terminated. The House is well aware of what were the consequences of that appeal to the Cabinet by my noble Friend. I do not arrogate for a moment to ourselves the merits which attach to admirable troops and admirable commanders; but the House knows that if the Expedition had failed we must have borne the responsibility; and I think every impartial mind will admit that in its management there were some circumstances for which Her Majesty's Government may claim credit. First of all, for the decision that the Expedition should be undertaken; secondly, for the selection of the commander; and, thirdly, for the energy and fertility of resource with which our troops were sustained and supported. Though that Expedition necessarily took its origin from the Department over which my noble Friend presides, its management fell to the Secretary of State for another Department; and whatever may be the fate of the present Ministry, I am sure my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India will ever be remembered in reference to that Expedition by the House of Commons with respect and by the country with confidence. I think that in attempting to put before the House the position of the Government I have shown that if we were entitled, according to the spirit of the Constitution, when we acceded to Office, to advise Her Majesty to dissolve Parliament, and if we were further entitled to take such a step in consequence of having passed the Reform Bill, there is nothing in our administration of the affairs of this country, under the great heads to which I have adverted which ought to deter us from adopting such a course, or ought to make us fear an appeal to our fellow-countrymen.

Now, Sir, in this state of affairs a new question arose in the House of Commons. It arose suddenly at a few days' notice. I am not imputing that as any blame to the right hon. Gentleman. I am only stating facts. I do not wish to have any controversy on an occasion like this, but I am recalling the recollection of the House to facts. At a few days' notice the House was asked to consider a proposition of a startling character, which was, in fact, no less than the disestablishment of the Church in a portion of Her Majesty's dominions. It so happened, as the House is aware, that on the Motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Earl Russell) there had been a Royal Commission issued by the present Government to inquire into the condition of that Church. It was also well known that the Commission had been intrusted to very able men, and that they were pursuing their labours with considerable energy and determination. It was even known that there was more than a prospect of their reporting the result of those labours to Parliament this year. Therefore, considering the peculiar duties which devolved upon the Government—namely, of passing the supplementary Reform Bills, I do not think it was unreasonable in them that they should have met the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman by referring to the Royal Commission, by impressing upon the House the expediency of waiting until the Commission had reported, and then, either in this, or probably in the next Parliament, taking that course which the wisdom of Parliament, with the information from that Commission before it, should authorize and induce them to adopt. Well, Sir, the House was not of that opinion; and, therefore the question was brought before it, the distinct issue whether the Church should be disestablished in Ireland. Now, Her Majesty's Ministers were entirely opposed to that policy, and for distinct reasons which I will give. I go into this matter, not with a wish to obtrude any arguments on the House at this moment, or to introduce any matter of controversy; but merely with the wish that the House should on such an occasion clearly and distinctly understand what were the reasons for which we opposed the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone). We opposed the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland, firstly, because we considered it to be a retrograde policy—that it was calculated to revive and continue animosity, and that it ran counter to that policy of conciliation of classes and creeds which had for thirty-four years been pursued in this country, and not unsuccessfully. Secondly, we opposed it because we thought it endangered property. Thirdly, we opposed the policy of disestablishment because it disunited the principle of religion from authority, and by so doing, in our opinion, degraded and weakened authority. And fourthly, lastly, and chiefly, we opposed it because, if that principle were adopted, we could see nothing that would prevent its application to England sooner or later, and in our opinion, much sooner than was anticipated. The consequences of the application of that principle to England would be very serious. If the union between Church and State is abolished, the Church must either become an imperium in imperio, and so become probably more powerful than the State, and weaken the action of Government, or it must break into endless sects and schisms, which would finally be absorbed by the tradition and discipline of the Church of Rome. I say, then, that equally, in either alternative, the Royal supremacy must be destroyed. The Royal supremacy has hitherto been looked upon as the corner-stone of the Constitution. It is universally admitted to be the only security for religious liberty; and, in our opinion, it is one of the main guarantees for our civil rights. These were the reasons why the Government opposed the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman. The House, however by a large majority, decided in favour of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman, and we had then to consider whether the vote of the House in that respect militated against the constitutional claim to which I have before referred, to advise Her Majesty to dissolve Parliament, and which, in our opinion, was not weakened by our general conduct in the administration of affairs. There were three reasons which convinced us that the decision of the House did not militate against the assertion of such a privilege on our part; and they were these:—In the first place, it was evident that no conclusive legislation upon the Church in Ireland could take place in this Parliament. That is acknowledged. In the second place, it was notorious that this question had never been hinted at on the hustings when this Parliament was elected. And thirdly—and I state this with the utmost respect to hon. Gentlemen opposite, and an unwillingness to assert an opinion which is not the opinion of the majority, but I am bound in duty to my Colleagues to express it—it is our profound conviction that the opinion of the nation does not agree on this subject with the vote of the House of Commons.

Mr. Disraeli

Now, Sir, before I advert, as I will do in a moment, to the course which we feel it our duty to take with reference to that vote on Thursday night, I would ask the indulgence of the House to touch upon a subject which, indeed, concerns the interests of the House itself. We have been accused—and, I am sorry to say, not merely out-of-doors—of unworthily clinging to Office, and of governing this country by a minority. Accustomed as I am to aspersion, I should be perfectly willing to let these taunts pass unnoticed, but that they involve—in my mind and in the opinion of my Colleagues—a public principle of importance. Now, Sir, in the first place I would observe that I know of nothing in my conduct in this House, since I have sat in it, or in the conduct of any of the Gentlemen who on former occasions have been my Colleagues in the Governments of Lord Derby, which at all justifies this taunt of unworthily clinging to Office. I would remind the House that in 1852, when I was leading this House, and was put in a minority on the measures which I brought forward, I was openly adjured, and I was privately solicited—and Lord Derby experienced the same appeals—not to resign our trust. We were assured, then, by the highest authorities, by Gentlemen who were our rivals, and many of whom became our successors, that the vote they arrived at was not a vote—being a financial vote—which authorized our resignation of Office: and the utmost efforts were made to prevent our retirement. Now, although Lord Derby's opinion on that point was the same as my own, he, with characteristic generosity—considering that, as I sat in this House, I had borne the burden of the fight on the subject—left it to me to decide. And I never hesitated for a moment as to the course to be adopted; being in a minority in our own Parliament, we went out of Office. There was no unworthy clinging to Office under those circumstances. Well, Sir, what happened in the year 1859, when I brought forward the first Reform Bill which I introduced to the notice of Parliament? We were placed in a minority by the success of the Motion of the noble Lord (Earl Russell), who then sat below the Gangway on the opposite side. Lord Palmerston was then Leader of the Opposition, and he adjured me in the most decided and solemn manner neither to resign nor to dissolve; and he privately repeated this. He said—"You have failed on a question on which every Ministry has failed—on which every party and every public man has failed; and the vote we arrived at was not a Vote of Want of Confidence. As far as I am concerned"—and he was the man who led the party, and who became Minister when we retired from Office—"nothing of the kind was intended." But we did not follow the advice of Lord Palmerston. We appealed to the country, which was as constitutional a course as resigning, and our conduct showed that on that occasion there was no unworthy clinging to Office on our part. But now it is said we are governing by a minority. Well, Sir, if that be true, the imputation is upon the House of Commons. If a body of men have for nearly two years conducted affairs by a minority, the imputation founded upon such a circumstance recoils upon the House, and not upon the Government. The fact is, there is no foundation for the charge. It is very true that, told by the head, we have never had a majority of pledged partizans; but there have been relations of courtesy and cordiality between the Government and the great body of the House, and we were allowed to carry on affairs—as I have shown not unsuccessfully—because the majority of the House did think that, under the circumstances of the case, it was to the advantage of the country that we should continue to administer affairs. It is not wise on the part of the House of Commons to analyze with too close a scrutiny the numerical elements by which a Ministry is carried on. To do so would vitiate the practical qualities for which this House is celebrated. Allow me to remind you of a parallel case. When Lord John Russell was first made Prime Minister, he took Office under circumstances very similar to those under which we acceded to power—the Conservative party was broken then as the Liberal party was broken in 1866. Lord John Russell took Office with a majority of 100 sitting opposite to him, and no single Member of that majority ever joined the party of Lord John Russell. It was perfectly on the cards, if they had agreed on some particular subject, as the Opposition have recently done, that Lord John Russell should have been thrown in a majority any night. But no one reproached Lord John Russell for carrying on the Government with a minority, and he carried on the Government with a minority for no less a term than five or six years; and he did it for the advantage of the country and with the full approbation of Parliament, being morally supported by a majority as we have been morally supported by a majority. It is advantageous for the House that they should have clear conceptions on this subject, because it is not for the honour of the House that it should be said that any body of men who did not possess the confidence of the majority are still able to conduct the affairs of the House. There is only one other remark which I will presume to make upon this subject. The same noble Lord to whom I have so frequently referred in the course of these observations has recently written several pamphlets, and he has written one in which he has made free comments—which I shall not notice—on my conduct, and has also given me advice. He says that, in the situation in which I am placed, I ought to follow the example of Sir Robert Peel, and resign. Now, Sir, in the first place, allow me to remark that there is no similarity whatever between the position occupied by the present Government and that occupied by the Government of 1835. Sir Robert Peel was defeated three times on the Irish Church during the five months he sat on this Bench as Prime Minister; but he was defeated four times also on very important questions—one being not less important than the election of the Speaker. From the very first day that he assumed this place to the last day of his retaining it, he met with a violent and unscrupulous opposition. I do not say that offensively, for, no doubt, this conduct was founded on reasons which were felt to be sufficient. But when Sir Robert Peel resigned, look at the language which he used. He said—"I will not continue this struggle, because I can no longer bear defeat in a Parliament which was elected under my auspices and on my own appeal."

Mr. Disraeli

Having made these remarks, I will now, with the permission of the House, revert to the vote of Thursday night, and state to the House the course which Her Majesty's Ministers, under these circumstances, feel it their duty to take. After that Vote, I lost no time in soliciting Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to grant me an audience, and, with that promptitude which Her Majesty always displays when the public interest is at stake, she granted that audience immediately, so that I had the advantage of being in audience of Her Majesty on the afternoon of the very day on which the vote was taken. On that occasion I placed—I am sure fairly and completely—before Her Majesty the position of the Government and the position of parties, and the position of the country with respect to them; and I told Her Majesty, with her permission, that, under the circumstances—with which from my previous narrative the House is perfectly acquainted—the advice which Her Majesty's Ministers would, in the full spirit of the Constitution, offer to Her Majesty would be that Her Majesty should dissolve this Parliament, and take the opinion of the country as to the conduct of her Ministers and the question of the Irish Church. But, at the same time, with the full concurrence of my Colleagues, I represented to Her Majesty that there were important occasions on which it was wise that the Sovereign should not be embarrassed by personal claims, however constitutional, valid, or meritorious; and that if Her Majesty were of opinion that the question at issue could be more satisfactorily settled, or the just interests of the country more studied, by the immediate retirement of the present Government from Office, we were prepared to quit Her Majesty's service immediately, with no other feeling but that which every Minister who has served the Queen must possess—namely, of gratitude to Her Majesty for the warm constitutional support which she always gives to her Ministers, and, I may add—as it is a truth which cannot be concealed—for the aid and assistance which every Minister receives from a Sovereign who now has had such a vast experience of public affairs. In fact, Sir, I tendered my resignation to the Queen. Her Majesty commanded me to attend her in audience on the next day, when Her Majesty was pleased to express her pleasure not to accept the resignation of her Ministry, and her readiness to dissolve this Parliament so soon as the state of public business would permit. Under these circumstances, I advised Her Majesty that, although the present constituency was no doubt as morally competent to decide upon the question of the disestablishment of the Church as the representatives of the constituency in this House, still it was the opinion of Her Majesty's Ministers that every effort should be made with a view that the appeal, if possible, should be directed to the new constituency which the wisdom of Parliament created last year; and I expressed to Her Majesty that, if we had the cordial co-operation of Parliament, I was advised by those who are experienced and skilful in these matters that it would be possible to make arrangements by which the dissolution would take place in the autumn of this year.

Before I conclude I wish to refer to something which peculiarly concerns the Public Business, but which happened after I quitted the House on Thursday night. I am told that, unexpectedly, a scene of some warmth occurred, and that it was stated by one of the highest authority in this House, and for whom, notwithstanding our constant struggles, I personally have much respect, that I did not treat him fairly in the arrangement of the business for this night—that I had even deceived him. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] Well, I shall take the words which the right hon. Gentleman alleges he used, for I am sure he will only say that which is strictly true; but I will refer now to more important matters. I did not leave the House, and should not have left the House—though hon. Members may understand that there was an exigent reason for my doing so—unless I had thought that between the right hon. Gentleman and myself there was a very clear understanding as to the course of business. If the right hon. Gentleman, at the time he agreed with me as to the duration of the adjournment, had expressed any wish respecting the day for which the Resolutions should be fixed I would have met him, as is my custom, without any difficulty. But he did not allude to the subject. If the right hon. Gentleman had asked me for Monday, Monday he should have had; but as to the arrangement of the business of the House by me being a violation of any pledge or understanding, I honestly confess that I paid very little attention to the arrangement of the business for this Monday. I gave formal and indifferent orders when I left the House, and I thought it more than probable that I should never appear again at this table, except to make the formal arrangements which the public business of the country required. Nothing, therefore, could be further from my intention than to treat the right hon. Gentleman in the manner in which he seemed to convey to the House I treated him. Sir, however bitter may be our political dissensions, I trust that the conduct of business in this House will always be a subject of perfect courtesy and the most impartial fairness. I am quite sure that if that rule is not rigidly adhered to a popular assembly like the present will cease to be an assembly of Gentlemen, and must be a scene of rude anarchy. Sir, with regard to the Resolutions upon the Irish Church—having disapproved the first Resolution, I, of course, disapprove the second and the third; but I look upon these two Resolutions as corollaries of the first Resolution; and being now about to make an attempt to carry on the business of the country with the utmost expedition, I certainly have no wish whatever to enter into protracted debates and formal divisions on the second and third Resolution. I shall offer them my hearty negative, but I shall take the course which I have indicated; and so far as the right hon. Gentleman is concerned, I shall be perfectly ready to place at his disposal the earliest public day that is at my command. But with regard to the Motion which the right hon. Gentleman has placed upon the Paper, I could not assent to such a Motion with any self-respect. Indeed, if I assented to it, I do not think I should be consulting the general interest of the House. To such a Motion I must give my unqualified assent. [Mr. GLADSTONE: You mean opposition.] Yes, opposition. The right hon. Gentleman corrects me so fairly that I hope he will not insist on the course he has indicated. I have now stated to the House the results of the consideration of their position by Her Majesty's Government, and I have, by the permission of the Queen, without reserve, laid before them everything that has transpired since the division of Thursday night.

MR. GLADSTONE: It appears to me, Sir, that whether the course adopted by the right hon. Gentleman in introducing into the statement he has made so much matter of a retrospective nature and so much matter of an argumentative character be a novel course or not, it is attended with this inconvenience—that those who have travelled over the ground along with the right hon. Gentleman, and who are not able to take the same view of the matter, he has touched upon as necessarily presents itself to his mind, cannot pass by in absolute silence the retrospective portions of his speech. Now, with respect to the panegyric which the right hon. Gentleman has pronounced upon the conduct of most of the Departments—not all the Departments, nor all the great Departments—of the State under the present Administration, all that I have to say is that I think such a panegyric would have been more in place upon some occasion when the existence or the general conduct of the Government was questioned by an opponent than when the right hon. Gentleman was only showing to us the reasons which have satisfied his own mind and that of his Colleagues that he would best perform his duty to his country by continuance in Office. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman's statement upon this matter assumes in so far the character of a challenge, that, while I freely own in respect to various Departments of the State that I see no reason why Parliament should regard the conduct of public affairs by them otherwise than with satisfaction, there are other Departments—and, I must say, the whole of the great spending Departments, the military and the naval Departments, and the great controlling Department of the Treasury—with respect to which I, for one, cannot express anything that approaches to satisfaction or approval, and must reserve my free right to question both the past conduct and the present intentions of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of finance. I do not now refer to finance. He will understand that I refer to that other great function of the Treasury which makes it the main security of the country for moderating the public expenditure. I pass on from that subject, and I must notice what was stated by the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the Irish Church. The right hon. Gentleman succinctly, but in very plausible terms, ran over the whole of the arguments which have governed himself and his Colleagues in their opposition to the policy recommended from this side of the House and adopted upon three separate occasions by a large majority of the House of Commons. Certainly I think that the right hon. Gentleman cannot complain of the liberty which is afforded to him by the House, because he says—and, indeed, he repeated the statement at several intervals in his speech—that he would on no account use angry language, that he would entirely avoid the origin of controversy, and yet these declarations are in his mind sufficiently elastic to allow of his describing in the same speech the conduct pursued within the memory of many of us by the party which now occupies these Benches as a violent and unscrupulous Opposition. I shall endeavour to follow rather the precept than the practice of the right hon. Gentleman, and will only say that, with regard to the assertions and arguments that he has used upon the Irish Church, I do not think that anything he has said will tend in the slightest degree to weaken the strong convictions or the fixed intentions which I believe prevail on this subject; and I must say also, that I think the right hon. Gentleman did an act of gratuitous and unnecessary courtesy when, after he had drawn the frightful picture of a land surrendered to the ravages of unlimited sectarianism, and had pointed out that the unfortunate destiny of all those divided parties was to be swallowed up in the devouring maw of the Church of Rome—I think it was unnecessary to specify that he did not mean by the expression he used any ill compliments to the Church of Rome. Certainly not, Sir. Unquestionably not. Compliments to the Church of Rome so extravagant as that, I, for one, never have heard. I will only say I believe they would surpass alike the expectations and even the capacity of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Sir George Bowyer). I think, Sir, an apology to those unfortunate members of the Church of England and the Non-conformist bodies, the Church of Scotland, and the Presbyterians not established in Scotland, would have been considerate on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, because we have been in the belief that there is in the religion that we profess something in the nature of a guarantee and a security, and we regard those opinions that threaten us with absorption and extinction through the power of the Church of Rome as servile and debasing. The right hon. Gentleman said we were all aware that the Commissioners on the Irish Church are working with considerable energy. He may be aware of it; I certainly was not at the time when this Motion was made, although I have heard a great deal of its action since. While I am speaking of what I may call the revelations of the right hon. Gentleman, I must refer to one remarkable in its character. It was that in the month of December, 1852, as I understand the right hon. Gentleman, almost all or many of the leading persons who were at that Ministerial crisis opponents of the Government, and who subsequently became Members of the succeeding Administration, made representations—I believe he said to the Earl of Derby and himself—to the effect that they ought on no occasion to resign in consequence of the adverse vote at which the House of Commons had then arrived. It is not for me to contradict the right hon. Gentleman. I had myself some share of the responsibility for the overthrow of that Government. I do not know in what category the right hon. Gentleman considers me to have stood; but certainly I was not one of those persons who made such a representation; and not only so, but being on the most cordial terms of political and personal friendship with almost all who constituted the succeeding Cabinet, I can only say that the declaration I have received from the right hon. Gentleman is the first assurance that has ever come to me—nay, the first inkling of such intelligence as that representations of that nature were conveyed to the right hon. Gentleman and to the Earl of Derby. The right hon. Gentleman has made constitutional propositions, or rather propositions touching the Constitution, such as I for one am not able to pass without notice. The right hon. Gentleman treats it as a matter of course that every Administration, or at least every Administration sitting in a Parliament that was called into existence before the Ministry itself, is entitled, for no other cause than the cause of its own existence, to inflict upon the country a dissolution; and the right hon. Gentleman has distinctly told us that that infliction was the measure which he advised Her Majesty to adopt upon the present occasion. I have said to “inflict” upon the country a dissolution, because, from very old date and by high Parliamentary authority, the epithet "penal" has been attached to dissolutions of that character. Sir, I question, I challenge the doctrine of the right hon. Gentleman. I must tell him that if he wants authorities to support his doctrine—if he wants precedents to sustain it, those precedents must be drawn from the former conduct of the Earl of Derby and himself. Where will the right hon. Gentleman find a case, until Friday last, in the whole history of this country, in which a Ministry, twice defeated by majorities of 60 and 65, advised the resort to a dissolution? There is no such case. The right hon. Gentleman speaks as if this resort to a dissolution—an adverse or penal dissolution—were an everyday practice. What are the instances of such resort? The case of 1841 is a doubtful precedent; the Government which appealed to the country did so with a majority against it of a single vote. It was the same in the famous and memorable case of 1784, when, if I recollect rightly, Mr. Pitt appealed to the country after a division in which 190 Members voted for him and 191 against him. The right hon. Gentleman has named Sir Robert Peel; but he will not tell me that the opinion of Sir Robert Peel was that every Ministry was justified, upon the plea that the Parliament had not been elected under what the right hon. Gentleman calls its influence, in making a dissolution a previous condition to its resignation. In the first place, I deny that the question whether the Parliament was elected with this or that Government in Office is a consideration which, according to the doctrine of our Constitution, enters into the case in the manner and in the degree in which the right hon. Gentleman has represented it does. The right hon. Gentleman seems to suppose that such is the influence of an existing Government that it must necessarily be taken for granted that the effect of that influence is powerfully and conclusively felt in the elections. [Mr. DISRAELI made a gesture of dissent.] Very well, if the right hon. Gentleman does not take that for granted he only enables me the more broadly to question his proposition and to ask him to show me, from the history of this country, and from great constitutional authorities other than Members of the Governments of Lord Derby, where the doctrine is laid down that, irrespective of other considerations, an Administration as an existing Administration is entitled to make an appeal to the country a condition previous to its resignation of Office. Sir Robert Peel in 1846—beaten by a small majority, and having just carried a measure which insured for him unrivalled popularity—did not thus appeal to the country. I conceive the right hon. Gentleman is the person who is bound to prove his proposition. He has quoted no precedent whatever. [Mr. CONOLLY: Lord Palmerston in 1857.] The hon. Member must just this moment have come into the House. I have myself been quoting precedents where Ministers have appealed to the country, and he supposes me to be affirming the proposition which I deny. I do not lay down the doctrine that any Ministry has the right to appeal to the country before resigning; but I challenge and deny the doctrine that all Ministers have the right to appeal to the country. Lord Palmerston appealed to the country in 1857 upon a most important question of public policy. [An hon. MEMBER made a remark which did not reach the gallery.] Pardon me, we must not confuse together things essentially distinct. The right hon. Gentleman for the first half-hour of his speech never referred to the question of public policy, but argued that from the moment Lord Derby came into office he had the constitutional right to a dissolution, which constitutional claim he then proceeded to argue was not weakened but strengthened by the good conduct of the Government. It is against this proposition of the right hon. Gentleman that I am now venturing to argue. There are two conditions, as it appears to me, which are necessary in order to make an appeal to the country by a Government whose existence is menaced a legitimate appeal. The first of them is that there should be an adequate cause of public policy; and the second of them is that there should be a rational prospect of a reversal of the vote of the House of Commons. I have not said one word against the advice given by the right hon. Gentleman so far as it may be thought it can be founded upon one of those two principles. At the same time, I am not willing now to conceal my opinion that the right hon. Gentleman was not well justified in that advice. The right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues, as I have shown, are too much given to this practice of dissolution. Dissolution in 1852, dissolution in 1859, dissolution in 1868—and all these to determine the question whether the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends were to continue in office. Dissolution in 1852—the people gave their reply, and it was a negative one; dissolution in 1859—the people gave their reply, and it was again a negative one; and I entirely question this title of Governments, as Governments, to put the country as a matter of course to the cost, the delay, and the trouble of a dissolution to determine the question of their own existence. But if I am told, on the other hand, that the right hon. Gentleman would never have thought of referring to the country, especially for the third time after two unfavourable answers, the mere Ministerial existence of himself and his Colleagues, but that he did think he was justified in referring to the country the great question of the Irish Church, then, Sir, my duty is to regard that matter from a perfectly distinct point of view; and I say first of all that the right hon. Gentleman would be the first Minister who had declined to adopt, as a sufficient evidence of the judgment of the country, those majorities of 60 and 65 which have been recorded against him. Now, that is a matter of history—that is a matter of historical fact; and it is open to the right hon. Gentleman, or any other Member of this House, to question what I have said. But that is not all. We are now told that the question of the Irish Church was what was to be referred to the constituencies. Well, but the right hon. Gentleman has from the first denied that the present Parliament or the present constituencies ought to deal with the question of the Irish Church. And not only has he denied that, but it is admitted on all hands, nay, it is part of the case of the right hon. Gentleman when he comes to another portion of the argument, that when we are about greatly to broaden the basis of our representative institutions it is fair and right that the ultimate decision of the question should depend on the representatives of the new constituencies. Therefore the plea that this was to be a reference on the question of the Irish Church is no plea at all. Suppose that the right hon. Gentleman's ill-judged advice had been accepted by Her Majesty—as, happily, it was not—but suppose it accepted by Her Majesty, and the new Parliament had met, for what purpose would the new Parliament have met? Would that Parliament have disposed of the question of the Irish Church? Certainly not. All that the new Parliament could have done would be to have dealt with such a policy as I have humbly recommended, and shall again humbly recommend, the adoption of a Suspensory Act. That is the utmost the new Parliament would have done, and then it would have been justly confronted with the necessity of completing the work of Reform, and adjourning to the Parliament of the paulo post futurum the final settlement and adjustment of the Irish Church question. Therefore, I am bound to say that the only question for the sake of which the right hon. Gentleman thought fit to advise Her Majesty, in the face of great public inconvenience, to dissolve the present Parliament, with the certainty of another dissolution impending within a few months—possibly six or nine months afterwards—the only question, I say, for the sake of which he gave that advice was in truth the question of his own Ministerial existence. I do not wish to be responsible by my silence for allowing the statement of that advice to the House to pass without notice; that I, for one, do not think that the right hon. Gentleman who gave it was acting in the spirit of the Constitution, and I am heartily and thoroughly glad that that advice, though tendered, was not accepted. Now, Sir, with respect to the position of Her Majesty's Government, I need not detain the House. The plan of the right hon. Gentleman is this. He is at issue with the House of Commons—with what he on Friday morning called “the present” House of Commons—upon the subject of a proposal which one Minister, the First Commissioner of Works, declares to be the most revolutionary that has been made during I forget how many centuries—I forget how many, and I do not wish by any mistake of mine to commit the noble Lord—and with respect to which the Prime Minister told us that its ultimate consequences will, I think, be more grave than those of a foreign conquest. And it is to the House of Commons standing on the Resolutions so described in the language of the Ministry, that the right hon. Gentleman now proposes to proceed to a dissolution, a dissolution not immediate, according to the course of historical precedent, but postponed for a time which he vaguely designates as “in the autumn,” but which may, I think, probably be rather in the winter, and during that interval—and I think I have spoken moderately with regard to it—he standing on these relations with the House of Commons, proposes to carry through questions of great constitutional importance. And so it is that a Government professing to represent a constitutional party interprets and applies the principles of our Constitution. Sir, having described the position, I cannot subscribe to the propriety or wisdom of the course of the right hon. Gentleman; but that is not my affair. The fate of the right hon. Gentleman is in the first instance in his own hands, and, as far as I am concerned, I have other matters to consider which demands and which absorbs my whole attention and anxiety. We have not had perhaps all the advantages of the right hon. Gentleman in the choice of the mode in which, and the time at which we should declare our intentions; but our intentions—and when I say our intentions I speak of the intentions of those with whom I have been able to communicate, or whose minds I think I may venture to interpret—our intentions have this advantage, that they are in their nature clear, simple, and decisive. There is one question which is paramount to every other—the question of the relations, the Imperial relations, between England and Ireland, and the branch of that question which partly the proceedings of Her Majesty's Government, partly the state of affairs, and partly, if you like—for I do not shrink from the responsibility—our proceedings, have thrust into the foreground is the question of the Irish Church. What we have held may be summed up in these two propositions—that it was the duty of this House, emphatically, intelligibly, and without delay, to declare its mind upon the great question of the Irish Church Establishment—whether it ought or ought not to continue. That was the first of our propositions. Thus far we have proceeded. The House has declared itself with an emphasis and decision which on our part leaves nothing to be desired. So far, therefore, as I may presume to judge, we have all of us advanced much too far into the interior regions of this question to leave the idea open to anyone that there can be advantage in postponing or retreating from it now. The second of our propositions has been from the first that the abstract Resolutions ought, for reasons which when the time comes I shall be prepared to state, to be followed up, so far as depends upon the majority of this House in the exercise of its constitutional power, by the passing forthwith of a Suspensory Act, which shall have the effect of distinctly declaring the mind of the present Parliament, and of preparing the way for the action of the next Parliament. Well, Sir, there is nothing in the statement of the right hon.

Mr. Gladstone

Mr. Gladstone

Gentleman which, as it appears to me, modifies in any degree the force of this conclusion. We are prepared to go forward with the Resolutions that lie on the table, and of course it follows that we are prepared to go forward with the ulterior steps depending upon the carrying out of these Resolutions. Sir, I have no covenant to make with the Government; I have no question to put. The right hon. Gentleman, I assure him, is quite mistaken if he supposes that I intended on Friday morning to impute to him any breach of faith; for I did not believe that the arrangement of business of which I complained had been made by him, or if it had been made by him I should have been very loth to use words for which I had not sufficient evidence or warrant. What I said I was perfectly justified in considering on Friday morning was this, that on Friday afternoon we were in a condition, and were entitled, with the perfect understanding of the House, to proceed immediately after one Order had been disposed of, which I felt confident would not stand for more than a few minutes in our way, with the second and third Resolutions. That being so, I never doubted for one instant that when the right hon. Gentleman interposed, and said to us at any early hour on the morning of Friday that he proposed to adjourn to Monday, it was with the intention to place us on Monday afternoon in the same position in which we stood at that time. I think that was a reasonable construction, and my request a reasonable request. The Notice which I gave I gave advisedly, and with the purpose of pressing it to a division, in case I should find there was a public exigency to justify such a course. Now let me consider, after this explanation, how the matter stands. As I remember, and as I think the hon. Gentleman himself admits, his pledge to us was this—to give us, from the facilities at his command, a fair opportunity for the consideration of the Resolutions. So I understood him before, and so I understand him now. With regard to what is to follow, that is a matter which, if the House affirms the Resolutions, the House will no doubt be prepared to consider when the time comes. I should not be justified in asking from the right hon. Gentleman at this moment—and I do not think it would be for the public interest that at this moment I should endeavour to obtain from him—any further understanding. As I understand the question between the right

hon. Gentleman and myself, it is this: that he does not wish us to proceed to-day with the Resolutions; but I think I understood him to say that he would give me the earliest day which, with a reasonable regard to the convenience of public affairs, he can. I have no doubt that will be a very early day; and certainly those who think they have got in hand matters of very substantial and profound public interest and importance ought to be exceedingly loth to enter into conflicts with the Government on questions that are merely verbal or slight. I have only to say that I accept the offer of the right hon. Gentleman. I will not make the Motion of which Notice stands in my name for this evening. The right hon. Gentleman will have better means than perhaps I have of judging whether the discussion on the Resolutions is likely to occupy any extended time. Whether it is or it is not, of course my duty remains the same. I own that I think the view of the right hon. Gentleman that the second and third Resolutions are corollaries to the first Resolution is a sound and just view; and I therefore hope they may speedily receive the assent of the House in Committee. And when the Resolutions have been so assented to, of course it is obvious that the next step, and a very important step, will rest on the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government. I do not think it would be becoming in me to anticipate the time and the manner in which they may be likely to discharge that responsibility. All that I feel it necessary to say is that, as far as my conviction, and as far also as my intentions are concerned, our duty appears to me to be clear: to make no immoderate proposal, to discern carefully the limits, within which, at the present time, our action ought to be confined; but, having to the best of our judgment and ability defined those limits, and having been supported in the views, which we have thus far taken, by the voice of an overwhelming majority of this House, to persevere in every due and regular step that is necessary to insure the progress and the passing of the Bill, of which we shall have to speak when the proper time arrives, for the purpose of suspending appointments in the Irish Church.

MR. CONOLLY said, that, to put himself in order, he would conclude by moving the adjournment of the House. He was sorry that the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) did not agree with him that the precedent set by Lord Palmerston in 1857 was strictly applicable to the present occasion. But those who had the misfortune to come from Ireland and to represent Irishmen in that House felt, as they thought they had a right to feel, a deep interest in the present question; and when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, said it was not in their power to appeal against the decision of Thursday night, he must tell him that the abstract Resolution which had been affirmed by a large majority was in itself a great injustice to the cause which the right hon. Gentleman had in hand, and also to the Irish people. He appealed to the right hon. Gentleman, whether to bring before a moribund and self-condemned Parliament a question of such vital importance to the Irish Church was not in itself an unstatesmanlike act, and whether it did not justify those who wished to maintain that Church in appealing against the adverse decision to which he had referred? They had no chance in the present Parliament; and therefore he, for one, called on their Leader altogether to reject its conclusions on that question, and appeal to the justice of the people of England. What was the use of the Reform Bill and the enlarged constituencies if they were to be tied and bound to the decision of the right hon. Gentleman with a faction at his back? Those who stood by the institutions they had inherited from their forefathers would not give them up because the right hon. Gentleman had been enabled for that occasion to re-unite his scattered band of adherents to oust the present Government. He said that their trusty Leader on that (the Ministerial) side, at all events, had their confidence in the course he had taken. If there was a difficulty in the present state of affairs, the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was to blame for it; because he had brought forward in a dying Parliament a question, the decision upon which bound no man in the three kingdoms. That decision was null and void. They would have none of it; they appealed against it to the real and enlarged constituencies; to the more honest, and, as he believed it would prove to be, the stronger portion of the people of England. The hon. and learned Member for Clare (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) had analyzed the Irish vote on that Question unfairly, stating that 56 Irish Members had voted for the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, and 45 against him. But if they looked into the matter more carefully they would find that the 45 Irish Members who voted in the minority represented very nearly double the number of constituents that was represented by the Irish Members who voted with the majority. Therefore, as far as the Irish vote was concerned, it was substantially against, and not in favour of, the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, who for factious objects alone, and through his greed of power, had brought about that crisis. The question affected not merely the Irish Church, but the Act of Union; for, if the Article referring to that Church were repealed, what would the other Articles be worth? Thus there was more than appeared in the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman.

THE SPEAKER said, it was out of order for the hon. Gentleman to discuss the Irish Church Question, or to refer to past debates.

MR. CONOLLY said, he would cheerfully bow to the right hon. Gentleman's decision; but he had felt himself called upon to state that the Irish regarded the recent vote as grossly unjust.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Conolly.)

MR. LOWE: I wish, Sir, before we pass from this subject, to be allowed to call attention a little more closely than has hitherto been done to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to his interviews with Her Majesty. I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say—and if I misrepresent him I hope he will be kind enough to correct me—that he advised Her Majesty to dissolve Parliament at once and to appeal to the old constituencies that are to be displaced by the Reform Act, and that he offered Her Majesty as an alternative that the Government should resign. "In fact," he said, "we tendered our resignations." Her Majesty, however, as I understand the right hon. Gentleman, refused both those propositions. She refused to dissolve Parliament at once, and she refused to accept the resignation of the Government. But, having refused these two things—I do not quite comprehend how it came about, for whether the suggestion proceeded from Her Majesty or from the right hon. Gentleman is left in ambiguity—somehow or other it came about that the proposition which the right hon. Gentleman is entitled to make to the

Mr. Conolly

House is that he will dissolve, referring the question to the new constituencies, and he thinks with the co-operation of the House that may be done in the autumn or winter. Now, what I want to point out to the House is that this is a most fallacious way of representing what has really occurred. The right hon. Gentleman's proposal to refer the matter to the old constituencies was a real, bona fide proposal. Whether it was a wise one or not I am not going to say; but to say that he comes down to us with a dissolution in his hand, authorized by Her Majesty, and that that is the result of the division the other night, is merely trifling with the House. Why, what would have happened if the Irish Church question had never been raised and there had been no division? The right hon. Gentleman would, with the assistance of the House, have passed his measures during the Session, and would, as we all understood, have dissolved as soon afterwards as possible, so that a new Parliament might meet next spring. Well, Sir, there have been two adverse divisions, there have been large majorities against the Government, yet what does the right hon. Gentleman announce to us? That he is going to do precisely what he would have done had those divisions not occurred. I took note of the words of the hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly). The House smiled when the hon. Member said he treated the divisions as null and void, but he was only following his Leader, for that is precisely what the right hon. Gentleman does. He treats the solemn decision of the House, on a question which he himself characterized before the division as of the last importance, as mere air, absolutely making no difference whatever in the course which the Government meant to adopt. The statement about a dissolution being resolved upon in consequence of the division is a mere blind and delusion; for there would have been a dissolution in any case, and the two decisions of the House have had no weight whatever in the Councils of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman treats us as persons whose decisions are absolutely insignificant, making no difference whatever in the decisions of Her Majesty's Government, except that they have lost us a day of the Session, and given the right hon. Gentleman the trouble of a trip to Osborne and back, and of coming here to mystify us with this story of a dissolution. That is the way in which he treats the House. How does he want us to treat him? He says "In order that we may carry out this we count upon the cordial co-operation of the House." Cordial co-operation? how has it been deserved? What has the right hon. Gentleman done that he should have a right to count on our cordial co-operation in anything? He tells us in one breath that what we do is absolutely null, and asks us to trust a Government not only in a minority, but branded with the want of confidence of this House, to carry measures re-modelling the Constitution in two of the three members of the United Kingdom. That is the position he takes up; but, as my right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) says, it is more for his consideration than ours; our business is to go straight on. I could not, however, forbear from pointing out to the House how entirely they are mystified if they suppose that any change whatever has been wrought in the counsels of the Government, or any new element at all introduced into those counsels by the Resolution we came to. We are asked, not for a few weeks, while the necessary business is got through, and while preparations are made for a dissolution, but for nine or ten months at the very least to place the whole Government of the country in the hands of persons who neither trust Parliament nor are trusted by it. In their hands during the remainder of the Session are to rest these important measures—the Scotch Reform Bill, the Irish Reform Bill, the Boundary Bill, the Bribery Bill, and all questions of finance; while during the Recess they are to enjoy in the same way the power of directing the foreign policy of the country and military affairs, and of exercising all patronage and everything else: and why? Simply on account of the abstract right they assume to have a dissolution, which abstract right is so cogent that it will survive for nearly a year the time when the possibility of amicable action between them and the House has come to an end. No doubt, if the Earl of Derby, true to his principles and to the declarations of his political life, had on his accession to Office asked for a dissolution in order to take the opinion of the country, nothing could have been more fair and just; but when, instead of adhering to the principles of their party, the Government adopt the principles of the majority opposed to them, and constitute themselves the servants of the House, what right have they to ask an appeal to the country, against a House whose will they have carried out? If ever the right existed it was certainly forfeited by the transactions of last year. If ever there was a case in which we ought to insist on the rule that a Parliamentary majority and not a minority should govern, that case has arisen at the present time. I can imagine nothing tending more directly to put an end to Parliamentary government as hitherto existing in this country than that a Government, defeated in April under such circumstances as these, should be allowed, on account of difficulties of their own creation—for they arise out of the Reform Bill—to remain in Office till February, March, or April next. On what principle of constitutional government, I ask, can such a thing be justified? A Government may be justified in not going out immediately on being defeated, while preparing for a dissolution; but to remain in Office for nearly a year without anybody's confidence that I know of cannot be justified on any constitutional principles.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished, as an Independent Member, to remark on the statement of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire that the Irish Church question had no reference to the question of a dissolution. The Government had been taunted with being a warming-pan Government, and the right hon. Gentleman now argued that the Government, having acceded to Office while in a minority, were bound to carry out the will of the majority. If that doctrine were to prevail, it would give him, as Leader of the Opposition, the power of forcing through Parliament—it might be in defiance of the opinion of the country—any measure, which he might unexpectedly bring forward, as a Member of the Opposition, and therefore without responsibility, using the Government as his agents. Such a practice, he contended, would be a flagrant violation of the Constitution. The right hon. Gentleman opposite was evidently not an advocate for triennial Parliaments, since he had condemned the Prime Minister for having appealed to Her Majesty in favour of a dissolution as one of the alternatives he had submitted. Thus, the right hon. Member for South Lancashire virtually proposed to suspend the Constitution for so long as the present Government remained in Office. A House which had deliberately condemned itself as not sufficiently representing the people was not entitled to pass any other measures than those necessary to complete our representative system. Yet during this constitutional interregnum the right hon. Gentleman had unexpectedly brought forward a proposal to disestablish and disendow the Church in Ireland, having in the Session of 1866 walked out of the House, and refused to countenance that proposal. The right hon. Gentleman's complaint was that the head of the Government, acting in the spirit of the Constitution, on finding himself in a minority on this question, had submitted for the decision of his Sovereign whether the Government should resign, or whether this great issue should be referred to the country. There was no ground of complaint in this; unless it were that the Government did not insist on appealing to the constituencies, which they themselves had condemned, and four-fifths of which had by statute been declared not adequately to represent the national convictions and will. He saw no feasible or constitutional course except that which the Government, had recommended to Her Majesty, and he trusted, that the Government would abstain from proposing measures touching the Constitution, or any others than those necessary for completing the representation of the people. And as soon as those measures had passed, and the ordinary requirements of the public expenditure had been provided, the Government were bound to submit to the nation the great issue that had been raised by the right hon. Gentleman upon the Irish Church. Any other course would be unconstitutional. He could not but think that the course pursued by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) implied anything but a confidence on his part that the constituencies when appealed to would affirm the decision of the majority of the House of Commons.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he understood the First Lord of the Treasury to have stated that, with the assistance of the House, the Government would be able to take a dissolution of Parliament in the autumn. Now, the Reform Act of 1867 would not come into operation among the new constituencies until January 1, 1869, and he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed that the House should assist him by amending the Reform Act so that a dissolution might take place in the autumn? No doubt many new questions would be raised before the Revising Barristers which would result in appeals to the Court of Common Pleas. Many difficult questions might arise, and any course such as the right hon. Gentleman had indicated would thus be productive of great personal inconvenience.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. AYRTON said, that, before the right hon. Gentleman answered that question, he should be glad if he would give his (the Opposition) side of the House some better and clearer explanation of the position in which the Government stood, not only towards that House, but towards Her Majesty herself, because he had left the House in considerable doubt as to whether public affairs were now to be carried on under his advice and responsibility as a Minister of the Crown, or whether they were being carried on under the advice and responsibility of Her Majesty. If he understood the right hon. Gentleman correctly, he had placed two alternative propositions before Her Majesty for her consideration; but when two propositions were placed before the Sovereign it was obvious that a Minister shifted from himself the responsibility of taking either one or the other, and put the entire responsibility on the Sovereign to whom he gave such equivocal suggestions and advice. It seemed that Her Majesty was embarrassed by not having the clear advice of her Minister; and it was not very apparent whether Her Majesty suggested that something else should be done, or whether her Minister suggested it to the Sovereign. If so, the right hon. Gentleman must have put three courses to Her Majesty, and left with her the responsibility of deciding which course should be adopted. That state of things was a very serious perplexity to Gentlemen on his side of the House; for they did not know whether they might not be taking a course which was not only contrary to the views of Her Majesty's Ministers, but to the views of Her Majesty herself, which had been brought before the House in so extraordinary a manner. The matter was one that might exercise a very material influence over the minds, not only of Members of that House, but of the entire country. According to one portion of the right hon. Gentleman's statement, he appeared to be a suffering Minister, who was holding Office by the wish of the Queen, for the benefit of the people. A Minister in that position carried with him an enormous amount of sympathy, and throughout the whole country such a suffering Minister must receive an assistance and support which would not be accorded to a

Minister who held Office on his own advice and responsibility against the twice-repeated judgment of the House of Commons. The House was entitled to know whether the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues sat upon that Bench upon the undivided responsibility of Ministers of the Crown, without any reference to the views and opinions of the Sovereign herself. To impose upon the House any other state of affairs was unconstitutional, and might lead to the most disastrous consequences. The right hon. Gentleman not only left the House in this ambiguity, but in the name of the Sovereign he tendered a kind of bargain to the House of Commons, and a bargain of the most marvellous character. A great majority of the House, after protracted debates, having come to the conclusion that a certain course of policy was necessary, this majority was to be declared merely nominal, and its conclusion to be set aside. And what was to be the consideration for such an abdication of duty on that side of the House—that the right hon. Gentleman should for eight or nine months have at his disposal the whole power and influence of the Executive Government and the patronage of the Crown for the purpose of defeating the policy which a majority of that House had deliberately adopted? That was a most extraordinary bargain to propose; and the right hon. Gentleman must have supposed that his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) was in a state of unusual weakness, if he imagined he would entertain such a proposition. He was glad that his right hon. Friend would have nothing to do with such a suggestion, and that he had met it in the way he had done; for his duty was to go steadily forward with the policy he had enunciated, and to bring it to a legitimate conclusion in the present Session. He thanked his right hon. Friend for entirely repudiating the offer of Her Majesty's Ministers. Such a course would have been impracticable, and unworthy the acceptance of the majority of the House. The duty of the Opposition was to assert and to re-assert that essential policy which would alone secure the pacification of Ireland; and if Ministers desired to remain in their places they must accept it, and do the work of that (the Opposition) side of the House. There must be no flinching from that; and if the Government declined to accept the situation, then they must proceed upon their own undivided responsibility, and not shift or cast it upon the august Sovereign whom they ought to serve, but whom in reality they did not serve when they thus brought Her Majesty's name into question.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had stated that it was his intention to propose to Parliament some legislation which would enable a dissolution to take place in the autumn. Now, strictly speaking, the autumn did not end until the 21st of December, and as, by the Act, the new registration would not be in force until the 1st of January, 1869, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman—not to fix the day—but to state at about what time he contemplated going to the country to a General Election; and, further, whether the new Parliament would be called together as soon as it was elected?

MR. BOUVERIE: Sir, I must raise my voice, humble though it be, against the continuance of the present most mischievous, anomalous, and unconstitutional state of things. The right hon. Gentleman two months ago announced that he had been authorized by Her Majesty to assume the first place in the Government of this country, and as First Minister of the Crown attempted to indicate the policy that he meant to pursue. By way of making it clear, he said that policy would be the policy of the Earl of Derby. Considerable doubts were entertained at the time as to what this policy of the Earl of Derby meant. But now, I apprehend, we have some further information on this subject, because the Earl of Derby has recently indicated his policy on the question which is now before Parliament, and, as I understand it, the right hon. Gentleman's Government have exactly followed the counsels of the Earl of Derby. The policy of those counsels appears to be to try and set the two Houses of Parliament at loggerheads with each other, and to put this House of Commons at variance with the Crown. Now, it is a most essential part of the working of our Constitution in modern times that this House should be in harmony with the Crown. In ancient times we had perpetual quarrels and differences with the Crown, and for more than 100 years those quarrels continued. They were of the most portentous character, for there were two rebellions, three revolutions, and one change of dynasty before we got the system of government into the right groove, and established that mode of government which brought the Crown into constant harmony with the House of Commons. That mode of government was that the majority of the House of Commons gave their confidence to the Government, and the Government represented the Crown, and in that way there was a permanent cessation of all variance between the House of Commons and the Crown. But, if the views now expressed by the right hon. Gentleman opposite are to be followed out, no long time will elapse before there will be a renewal of those differences between the Crown and the House of Commons which all who take an interest in the good government of the country must have hoped had ceased for ever. The right hon. Gentleman attempted to lay down a most startling doctrine, on which my right hon. Friend below me (Mr. Gladstone) has most justly animadverted—that a Ministry were entitled to a dissolution, and that, when defeated on some great question, they might keep that right of dissolution, as it were, in their pocket until a convenient season, and threaten the House of Commons with it. Against such a doctrine I, for one, protest. For 100 years after the Revolution it was an admitted axiom in this House that when the Government of the day could not command a majority in the House of Commons on great questions of policy there should be a change of Administration. A new rule was, however, introduced at the time to which my right hon. Friend below me alluded—during the first Government of Mr. Pitt, in 1784—which has been clearly laid down by high constitutional authorities. I will read to the House the opinion on this point of one whom many of us knew, whom some of us loved, and whom, I am sure, we all respected—I mean the late Sir George Lewis. He says in his book on the Administrations of Great Britain—

"It was not, in fact, definitively and clearly established until the year 1784, that where there is a conflict between the personal opinions of the Sovereign and those of a majority of the House of Commons the latter and not the former is to prevail, unless, indeed, a dissolution and a new election should reverse the decision of the previous Parliament."

He then goes on to quote the opinion of Earl Russell, than whom there is no better authority on Constitutional Law, who says—

"The precedent of 1784, therefore establishes the rule of conduct, that if the Ministers chosen by the Crown do not possess the confidence of the House of Commons they may advise an appeal to the people, with whom rests the ultimate decision. This course has been followed in 1807, 1831, 1834, and in 1841."

Now, what, let me ask, is the difference between that course and the course which the right hon. Gentleman opposite informs us the Government are going to pursue? He does not tell us that the business of the Session is to be wound up immediately, and that the dissolution will take place at once. He simply says, "There is to be a dissolution at some future time to enable the constituencies to pronounce an opinion on the question at issue between the two sides of the House, and to return new representatives, and because that opinion cannot now be given, in consequence of the new constituencies not having yet been called into existence, we shall continue in Office until their opinion can be given, and shall carry on the affairs of the country, in spite of an adverse majority of the House of Commons." This, I contend, is an entirely new rule which the right hon. Gentleman seeks to establish, that because some difficulty exists in the way of a dissolution at the present moment the Government are nevertheless to remain in Office under all the circumstances of the case, and to exercise all the powers of an Executive. It is, in short, an advance on the doctrine of power to dissolve greater than has been made since the Revolution, and which the House would do well, I think, to regard with the greatest jealousy. And what is the precedent to which the right hon. Gentleman referred us, with bated breath, when dealing with this point. He tells us, "It is true we are in a minority, and much has been said on the inconvenience which results from such a state of things, but we have a great authority in our favour—no less an authority than that of Earl Russell, who, when he was first Prime Minister, took the reins of office, although in a minority, and held them for five years." Now, what, I would ask, are the real facts of that case? Earl Russell became Prime Minister when Sir Robert Peel resigned in 1846, and was avowedly supported by that distinguished Statesman and his Friends. There was no adverse division against Earl Russell's Government during the remainder of that year, and I may inform the right hon. Gentleman that it is a constitutional doctrine that a Ministry which comes into Office, although in a minority, is entitled to have a fair trial. When the Administration of Mr. Addington succeeded that of Mr. Pitt, Mr. Pitt, el-though they were in a minority, argued with great force that, having been intrusted with the conduct of affairs by the Crown, it was but right that a fair trial should be given them. I may add that in the case of Earl Russell's Government the right hon. Gentleman seems entirely to forget that that Government having taken Office in 1846, there was the very next year a General Election, and that a majority was returned by which it was supported until 1852. I venture to say that the position into which the right hon. Gentleman is driving the House is most unsatisfactory and mischievous. All the machinery, by means of which our business is conducted, is turned topsy-turvy. The theory of our Parliamentary government is a very simple one. The Government propose certain measures, which they recommend for the adoption of the House of Commons, and it is the duty of the House to criticize and control the Government. In that way the public business is fairly conducted, and truth is, on the whole, arrived at. But now this state of things is about to be reversed. Her Majesty's Ministers must propose measures either in accordance with their own principles or with those of the Opposition. If the former, they are liable to be at once checkmated, and the conduct of business is not likely to be such as will be conducive to the welfare of the people. If, on the other hand, with a view to securing our support, they do not resist any measures which we bring forward, then we have no legitimate Opposition; the proper counterpoise of the Constitution is lost; there is no fair discussion, and measures passed under these circumstances are likely to prove entirely unsatisfactory. It is hopeless to expect to escape from this dilemma under the state of things which the right hon. Gentleman proposes for acceptance; and if he persists in the course which he has this evening shadowed forth, he will add nothing to the credit of his own Government, while he will create great mischief in the administration of the affairs of the country.

Mr. Bourvier

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said he thought the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Bouverie) had misrepresented the constitutional history of the country, in stating that from that history no precedent could be adduced of a Minister, who having the confidence of the Crown, but being in a minority in that House, continued to hold office. Now, that was the position of Mr. Pitt, who assumed the reins of government on the 18th December, 1783, not by any proceeding of his own, but on the dismissal by the Sovereign of the Coalition Ministry. Between that time and the dissolution which took place in March, 1784, Mr. Pitt was in a minority ten or twelve times. He afterwards appealed to the country on the ground that the House did not represent its opinions. He held Office till the country had become aware of the course intended by the House, and, looking at the result, he was justified in what he did. The hon. Member proceeded, amidst continued interruption, to compare the position of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government with that of Mr. Pitt, and concluded by reminding the House that Mr. Pitt persisted in his course until he had reduced the majority of the Opposition to 1, when he dissolved Parliament, and obtained an overwhelming majority from the country.

MR. BRIGHT: Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the reply which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire has made to the observations of the First Minister of the Crown, and the speeches that have followed, I think there are still some things that may with advantage be said before this debate closes. I believe that some Members of the House received the observations of the right hon. Gentleman opposite with surprise, and that some received them with astonishment. I am not sure that the feeling of astonishment will not prevail throughout the country, and that it will not be expressed for many years to come by those who look back upon the transactions of this period. The right hon. Gentleman asks us to overturn the long-existing usage of Parliament; he asks us to disregard that which is the first principle of our Parliamentary action. I am not stating this a mere matter of my opinion. I say that, apart from party considerations, there is not a Member of the House of Commons who will differ from me in the opinion I now express. He asks us to do this to maintain in Office a Minister who acceded to Office by arts which, in my opinion, were not the most worthy in their character, and who has maintained himself in Office by adopting—so far as he has adopted any policy—a policy utterly at variance with everything he professed when in Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman says—and some of his friends say, and I suppose think, that there is a disposition to do him and his Administration some injustice—[Mr. NOEL was understood to dissent.] But some of those on the other side talk as if we were doing the right hon. Gentleman some injustice. Now, two years ago a Government had been in Office eight months. It brought in a Bill perfectly consistent with its principles, and that Bill and that Government were assailed by the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends with no ordinary virulence. The result was that the Bill was rejected, and the Government was overturned. If any Government ever had a right to dissolve Parliament, I believe that Government had; but, acting on a scrupulous feeling, which I should say was somewhat too sensitive, that Government did not dissolve Parliament; they retired from Office. At that time I believe Her Majesty the Queen was anxious they should retain Office, and gave them her full consent, if they thought right, to dissolve the Parliament; they did not dissolve the Parliament, but retired from Office. That having taken place, the right hon. Gentleman treated certain Members of the House who had made a compact with him in a manner that was not thought by them very fair or honourable. The Session was wound up, and in 1867—the year afterwards—the right hon. Gentleman and his Government met Parliament, and in the course of that Session repudiated their allies, hooted their principles out of the House, and brought forward measures wholly opposed to their former principles, and, in point of fact, instead of any longer resisting a moderate proposition such as that of the Government of Earl Russell, they themselves advanced a proposition more extensive than that which, in the past year, they declared to be subversive of every Conservative institution of the country. Now, I will take care not to exaggerate anything. I will not describe what took place during that Session—I should raise a blush on the cheeks of some hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I would not do that. But I pass from the Session of 1867 to the autumn and winter of that year, and during that time, as hon. Gentlemen are aware, there was a grave manifestation of discontent in Ireland; there was great alarm through every part of the United Kingdom; there were troops pouring into Ireland continually; there were Commissions specially appointed to try offenders; there were State trials in abundance—at this moment there are, I believe, about 100 men undergoing sentences to various terms of penal servitude for their offences, and, more than that, some men suffered death by the hands of the executioner, for offences arising from circumstances springing out of discontent in Ireland. Well, now, the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs) who had the most impartial and dispassionate judgment, probably, of any of the Members on that (the Treasury) Bench, and of whom the right hon. Gentleman has to-night spoken in terms of praise which I will not say were exaggerated—this noble Lord said in the winter, only just before the meeting of Parliament, that the question of Ireland was "the question of the hour." Well, Sir, what happened when the House met? Why, this happened; a noble Duke, I believe, in the other House of Parliament—["Order."]—the other House of Parliament speak of us freely, and I know not why we may not refer to them. A noble Duke said that the policy of the Government with regard to Ireland was about to be explained in this House; and it was explained on a memorable evening by the noble Earl the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The noble Earl on that occasion, as we have reason to remember, made a speech extending over three hours and twenty minutes by the clock. He explained to us their policy, and I maintain that it was a policy of evil. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister has entered into this subject at greater length than I shall, but I shall make one observation upon it. The policy which he shadowed forth was this: that he would pay the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland—he would endow it; that he would charter and endow a Roman Catholic University; and that he would pay an increased, a double sum, as Regium Donum to the Presbyterians. He was anxious to maintain the Established Church in Ireland to teach Protestantism, but, at the same time, he was willing to endow a University which should bring up the young men of the laity of Catholic Ireland firmly grounded in the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion. Now that was a policy that did not agree with the opinion of this House, nor did it receive, as far as I can judge, the slightest support from any section of the people of the United Kingdom. Well, Sir, what followed naturally from that? Why this—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, speaking as the organ—the mouthpiece—and the Leader of the majority of this House, brought forward a counter policy, and a policy which I venture to say, has met, to a degree which many hardly anticipated, the approval of this House, and which is every week and every day receiving testimonials of approval throughout the country. Now, the right hon. Gentleman at first did not know very well how to meet this. The course he took was to put up—or to permit—the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn to move an Amendment; and that Amendment, brought forward by a Minister second only to the Prime Minister in importance was flatly refused by the House, which rejected it by a majority of no less than 60 votes. And let me remind the House that more than one-half of all its Members voted in opposition to the Amendment. Well, that is not a pleasant thing for a Government, though an adverse vote is not necessarily a humiliation to a Government. But I say that it is a great humiliation to a Government if it persist in clinging to Office after a vote of that character. Well, but the right hon. Gentleman came down to the House after the Recess, and he put on a kind of no-meaning, nothing-intending countenance, and proceeded with the business of the evening as if he positively never heard that there had been an adverse vote against his Government; and by-and-by, having got into Committee, the first Resolution was proposed, and the majority of 60 had swollen to 65. Now what has been the course—and I put it to hon. Gentlemen opposite—I put to any Member of the Government—of every Minister in our time—under any circumstances, I will not say like these, for there have been no circumstances exactly like these, but under circumstances approaching to them? I will not go back further, although I could, than the Reform Bill, and I say take the Government of Earl Grey, or the Government of Lord Melbourne, or that of Sir Robert Peel, or the first Government of Earl Russell; that of Lord Aberdeen, Lord Palmerston's Government, or the second Administration of Earl Russell, and taking these Governments, tell me if the Minister has not taken as his rule the decision of Parliament, and when he has lost the confidence of the majority of the House, as shown upon any matter of importance, he has in accordance with constitutional practice withdrawn from the Treasury Bench? I should like to ask why we are to depart from this practice now? I should have been very glad to have heard the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister give a fair reason; for that would have made it unnecessary for us on this side to call in question the position which he has assumed. The proposition is that the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends should be about twelve months more in Office. Well, I do not quite understand the proposition for a dissolution in the autumn. I doubt very much whether it be possible. In any case it will be so near the winter as to be greatly inconvenient, and I shall be somewhat surprised if it can be accomplished. I want to ask some one to tell us why we are to depart from Parliamentary usage, and from the acknowledged principles of our constitutional practice, for the sole purpose—there is no other purpose whatever that has ever been indicated in connection with it—of keeping the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends on that Bench. Can you give us a reason; can you give us an argument; can you give us a fact; can you even give us a decent pretence for it? Why, Sir, we saw this morning in a journal, which has a constant small liaison with the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, an article indicating the course which the right hon. Gentleman was likely to pursue. There was not the word “communicated” at the head of the article; but I dare say it was written after due consultation. What that article says is this:—“The Ministry can do nothing”—that is, between now and the General Election—“and the succession of the Opposition to power immediately after the General Election is certain.” Well, now, I would not assert anything of the kind, although the general opinion, I believe, in the House and in the country is, that it is highly probable. But as this comes from a great friend of the right hon. Gentleman, it probably expresses the opinion of the Government. [“Order!”] When I say great friend, I mean the friend who serves the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends almost every morning as well as he can. But, Sir, there was one reason given by this journal for what it advances which must create some amusement, and it is that, after the eight or nine months between this and the spring of next year, the Opposition will be much more prepared, it will be much riper, it will be found out who are the proper men to take Office, and that of the score at least of Gentlemen who expect to be in the next Cabinet, the expectant Prime Minister will have time to make a suitable selection; and that in the meanwhile the Government which is now in Office, being absolutely powerless as a Government is to take upon itself to perform the duties of an Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India in one of the debates—the debate, I think, before we went into Committee—told us—it was about midnight, but still we listened to him with attention—that the action of the party to which he belonged would be to resist the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire step by step. They would resist going into Committee, and if they were beaten they would resist the First Resolution, and the Second Resolution, and the Third Resolution; in fact, they would take the part of Opposition, and, while recognizing the superior power and authority of the right hon. Gentleman and those who support him, they would, to the utmost of their power, resist that authority. Now, I recollect Sir Robert Peel once addressing a Whig Government in very serious language. He told them that if they could come before the House with the authority of an united Cabinet, he thought what they had to recommend might be received with more attention. Is there any Gentleman in this House now who has ever seen since he sat in this House a Ministry that was so entirely chaotic with regard to a question of great public policy like that which is before us as is the present one. Why, when the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn made his speech, Gentlemen that I see opposite sat almost aghast; but when the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department rose to answer the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and his voice resounded through the House with the old ring of Protestant ascendancy and "No surrender," the countenances of those hon. Gentlemen brightened, the gloom left them, and they became as exhilarated and excited as I have seen them on so many occasions when they have been in the wrong. Well, Sir, I say that if you take the speeches of the Foreign Secretary and those of the Home Secretary, the Secretary for India, the First Commissioner of Works, and the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, you will not be able to make out distinctly what would be the general result, the net result of all their opinions if you could put them together. And then again, if you were to take the opinions of many other hon. Gentlemen opposite who have not spoken, you would find that they differ to a large extent from all the propositions shadowed forth by the Government, and from many of the opinions expressed on their own side of the House during the debate. Well, but we are advised to go on as we are, because we shall not get the Scotch Reform Bill, and the Irish Reform Bill, and the Boundary Bills passed if we do not. But the right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that he cannot pass the Scotch Bill as it is. A majority of the House intends to pass a Scotch Bill which shall accord with the opinions of those Members of the House from Scotland who are in favour of Reform; and I may say the same of the Irish Bill, for I understand that the Irish Members are prepared to make, or have made, certain propositions with regard to the Bill, and that Gentlemen on this side of the House, perhaps with an entire unanimity, will support the Amendments which they are prepared to submit. I am of opinion that both of these measures would be much better carried by a Government really in favour of Reform—because it is absurd to say that the Government which prepared these two Bills were in favour of any honest measure of Reform either for Scotland or for Ireland. ["No!"] Hon. Gentlemen opposite for either Scotland or Ireland who are not Reformers have no right and no reason to contradict me. I did not include them in my statement. I was speaking of Gentlemen on this side of the House who wish for an honest, or what the right hon. Gentleman the present Prime Minister called last year "a sincere," measure of Reform. I believe that both these Bills would be infinitely better in the hands of a Government representing a majority of the House and being Reformers, than in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and the supporters who sit behind him. But now the real difficulty which the course of the Ministry is bringing us into is one of a much more serious character, and I would ask the attention of the House—even of those who do not agree with us—to this. I wish to put it to them whether the point I am about to raise is not one of some importance. I will assume that what has been said by the newspaper from which I quoted is true, and that the Government could not expect a majority after the next Election. The passage is this—"The succession of the Opposition to power immediately after the next Election is certain." Now, I assume that to be true. I do not assert it, but everybody thinks that it is true, and I do not like to run counter to general opinion. Now, if this is to be so, and if we, as the majority of the House, permit the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues to remain in Office during the rest of this Session, I undertake to say that the Irish Church question—I speak now of the Bill which is to finally settle it—cannot even be grappled with by the House until the Session of 1870—two years from the present time. The calculation is very simple. If the right hon. Gentleman, unhappily, as he would think, should be turned out of Office in the spring of next year, I presume that some Gentlemen who sit below me will take the place of himself and his Colleagues. When they come into Office in the middle of the Session, it is quite obvious that they cannot during the Session undertake the settlement of the Irish Church question. They come in in February, or March, or April. They have no time, with the business of the Session on their hands to go into the necessary inquiries, and discussions, and deliberations, which will be extensive in character, and often of a most delicate and difficult nature, for the purpose of preparing and submitting to the House a comprehensive measure for the settlement of this great question. [An Hon. MEMBER: They are going to do it now.] The hon. Gentleman is mistaken. What they are going to do now is to lay a foundation for what is to be done hereafter. If the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government were now to say that he agrees with us on the question of Ireland, and on this Church question, and that he intended at the earliest possible period to introduce this measure to carry out that intention, I should not blame him in the least if he said he would require an autumn and winter Recess to prepare a measure of this magnitude and of this delicacy to submit to the House. Any Minister would require that length of time for doing so, and therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire at any time during the next Session of Parliament, were to come into Office according to the prediction of this newspaper, what will happen? That he cannot, during that Session of 1869, attempt to settle this question. He will require the autumn and winter of 1869 to prepare a Bill, and therefore the final measure on the Irish Church cannot by any possibility be introduced to the House before the Session of 1870. Now, I hope no hon. Gentleman opposite will disagree with me when I say that, if this matter is to be done at all, a delay of this kind is not only very unfortunate, but it may be perilous. An hon. Baronet on the other side of the House, the Member for the county, I think, of Londonderry (Sir Frederick Heygate) has spoken on this matter with great moderation, and in a manner, I am sure, which entitles him to the very respectful attention of the House. That hon. Gentleman said that he thought delay upon this matter was dangerous, and that if it was to be done it was very desirable that it should be done soon. And I have heard—I am not speaking of what has been said in debate—but I have heard, on that side, as well as this, expressions of opinion that if Parliament is really in earnest in settling this question, every other thing ought as it were to be put aside for the moment in order that the attention of Parliament might be exclusively turned to it, that the question should be settled finally, as speedily as possible. Now, the Session of 1868 has been, I am sorry to say, so far very unfruitful in legislation. It will not be unfruitful on this Irish Church question if the Resolutions from this side of the House are passed, and if the small Bill which is to be founded upon them should also pass. But the Session of 1869 will be absolutely wasted, as regards the question of disestablishing the Irish Church, if the right hon. Gentleman should remain in Office till some period in that Session, and then should be obliged to give way to his successor, who might be disposed to settle this question, but who certainly could not attempt to do that until the Session of 1870. The hon. Member for Londonderry did not go into detail as to his views; but I understood him to think that if there was delay there might be great animosity created on this matter; that its settlement might involve a penalty in the amount of anger and animosity created which would be a high price to pay for it. But, I say, if you delay the matter for two years after that which the House has now done, you will create doubt and uncertainty and suspicion in the minds of the Irish people, for whom you are about to legislate; and you may find that that satisfactory opinion in Ireland which has been growing rapidly from the moment when the opinion of the House was expressed on this subject, may be changed, and men may say that the Imperial Parliament, though it pretends to legislate wisely for Ireland, doubts and hesitates and delays, and, perhaps, after all, may refuse to do that which during this Session it has been promising to the Irish people. Well, but if we change the Government now—and I am no advocate for a change of Government merely as a matter of change—but if we change the Government now, and proceed with this measure as far as we can in its preliminary steps this Session, and with the final measure next Session, all that is good and that is growing of good in the Irish mind at this moment over the South and West of Ireland will be strengthened and confirmed, and every step you take, and every debate you hold, and every decision which is favourable to them to which you come, will bring some of the wavering thousands and thousands of the Irish people into alliance and sympathy with the Imperial Parliament and Government. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman asks us to give up all this merely that he may remain in Office—["No, no!"]—well, I maintain that when I have finished my sentence you will not be able to deny its correctness—that he may be maintained in Office until after the Dissolution of Parliament. My right hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Bonverie) and some other Gentlemen have referred to that question of the demand of Ministers to have a Dissolution of Parliament. I think it is one of the most outrageous propositions, on the principle on which it is demanded on their side, that has ever been made in the House of Commons—why you are making the Government not much better than a number of cricketers, who think that as their opponents have had an innings they should now have an innings. You are not now viewing the question as statesmen or as patriots; for surely no Minister has a right to go to the Crown and insist on or recommend a dissolution merely for the interests of the Minister or of his colleagues. If he can recommend a dissolution honestly, with the view of supporting the character of the House of Commons, and with the view of ascertaining honestly the opinions of the constituencies, then I hold a Minister may do that any time during his tenure of Office. But now you are asked to reverse all that has been done in past times, to overthrow every principle on this subject which other Ministers have acted upon, and to keep Ministers in Office while the Opposition is in power. I certainly am astounded at the course taken by many hon. Gentlemen opposite. They cannot be satisfied with what has been done during the last two years—neither last year nor this. The hon.

Mr. Bright

Mr. Bright

Mr. Bright

Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), I perceive, is not satisfied. I can see even at this distance anxiety pictured upon his countenance. He is ready to ask himself what next, and next. He knows there is no Government, and he knows there is no Opposition. He knows that in that state of things the legislation of Parliament becomes inconstant and irregular, and tends very often, it may be, to serious evils. Well, now, I do not think it is a satisfactory state of things that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire should sit on this side of the House, the representative of the majority, and the actual Minister in power, while hon. Gentlemen opposite hold to the places of Government, and are themselves quite unable to carry any measure. They cannot resist these Resolutions upon the Irish Church; they cannot carry their Scotch Reform Bill; they cannot, I believe, carry their Irish Reform Bill. I know not that there is anything connected with the Government which they can carry during this Session of the slightest importance, except the passing probably of that very unpleasant thing the addition of 2d. to the income tax. But, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends, if I may quote a phrase which I believe is to be found in Lord Derby's translation of a great poem, are to enjoy the ambrosial provender which is set before those who hold high Office in this country. The right hon. Gentleman has given the House no reason for his claim of dissolution except the interests of himself and of the Government. He has not set before the House that we do not represent the constituencies on whose account we sit here. Nobody denies that. If there be one thing more certain than another, it is that Gentlemen on this side of the House have been compelled rather than otherwise by their constituents during the last month to support the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. And, therefore, on that ground, the right hon. Gentleman opposite has no claim whatever to ask for a dissolution, and no claim whatever to sit as Minister, if that dissolution cannot be granted to him. Lord Burleigh said once—and he was considered a wise Minister—that England would never be undone except by a Parliament. I advise this House of Commons to look very warily as to its steppings and its course under the advice of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. I see in his course, and in that of his Colleagues, no adherence to any recognized principle—no regard for Parliamentary practice, and no care for constitutional usage; but a resolution that, having acceded to Office, to high Office, to the highest Office under the Crown, he will make every exertion to stick to it until he is actually driven from it by some decided and perhaps some offensive vote of the House. I believe that the right hon. Gentleman's course is not good for the reputation of himself and his Colleagues; that it is very adverse to the character of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and adverse even to the Conservative theories which they entertain; and I believe, at the same time, that it is throughout the whole country damaging to the character of Parliament. And if it damages the character of Parliament, I know nothing that can possibly happen that can be more damaging to the interests of the people of this kingdom.

MR. KENDALL said, he must protest against the assumption that there were only two parties in that House, and, as an Independent Member, he thanked the Prime Minister for the advice he had tendered to Her Majesty; any other course would have been a betrayal of his party. He contended that when the present Parliament was elected, the constituencies had not the slightest idea that the disestablishment of the Irish Church would be mooted, and the Prime Minister had therefore an undoubted right to appeal to the present constituencies. He did not see how they could get out of that. No one dreamt of it when Members were last at the hustings, and all he could say was that, had he been Prime Minister, he would not have hesitated for a moment, and he was only sorry that the dissolution had been delayed so long.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he did not think that the Irish Reform Bill could be fairly and temperately dealt with while the House had the chain of an impending dissolution hanging round its neck. He had merely risen for the purpose of expressing an opinion which was shared by many others—that if they were to be visited with a dissolution it would be more becoming and more constitutional that that dissolution should be at once.

SIR ROBERT COLLIER said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government on the subject of the proposed dissolution in the autumn. A great number of important and delicate questions would no doubt arise in the new registrations, questions with which the Revising Barristers had never before had to deal, and on which it would be absolutely necessary that the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas should be taken. Now, that Court did not sit till the 2nd of November, the term was not over till the end of November, and the registration appeals could not be decided before that, even if they were not protracted till the sittings after term, in which case there could not be a dissolution till December, unless it was intended to do away with those appeals. He wanted to know whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take that very unsatisfactory course?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am not going to trouble the House at any length, but one or two observations have been made which I must notice. Mainly, I shall speak with reference to what has fallen from the right hon Gentleman the Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) and others with regard to the audience which I had with Her Majesty. Now, what occurred with regard to a dissolution or resignation was simply this—that Her Majesty's Ministers advised Her Majesty in the present state of public affairs, and mainly to obtain the opinion of the country upon the great question at issue, to dissolve Her Parliament, but at the same time they stated that if that course were embarrassing to Her Majesty they would tender their resignations. Her Majesty did not accept our resignations, and gave her unqualified assent to a dissolution of Parliament without the least reference to old or new constituencies. It was, as I thought I had distinctly shown at a subsequent period—and speaking with reference to the difficulty of this matter of dissolving at the time most convenient to the public interest—that I adverted to the peculiar and unprecedented circumstances, and in so doing I was acting under the representation which was made to me shortly before I went to Osborne by a Gentleman well known and deeply versed in these matters. By relinquishing, as we should feel bound to do, any attempts at legislation which we have made, and by confining ourselves solely to passing the Boundary Bills and the two Reform Bills for Scotland and Ireland, we were informed that it was possible to have an autumnal dissolution, and by an autumnal dissolution I understand a dissolution in November. These statements were made by Gentlemen learned in the law and thoroughly experienced in matters of the kind; and though I shall not at this moment question the correctness of the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down—and I will make a note of his observations—I must say I feel confident, on account of the quarter from which I received my information, that that result can be attained. This, I think, is all it is necessary for me to say at present, though, of course, I shall take an early opportunity of laying before the House fuller information respecting the views of Her Majesty's Government on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) was very severe in his comments on the position of the Government, but I am totally at a loss to understand what the right hon. Gentleman wanted. Does he want an immediate dissolution of Parliament, and, if he does, is he prepared to support Her Majesty's Government in endeavouring to obtain it? I shall be very glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman what his intentions are upon that point. With a view to an early dissolution in connection with the new constituencies, it is of the utmost importance that we should pass the Boundary Bill. Until it is passed it will be impossible for me to introduce, as I am recommended to do, a short Bill to alter the days at present arranged for the Registration. Unless we get the Boundary Bill passed early in June it will be impossible to take steps which will, as I am informed, secure an early dissolution. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) has made a speech framed upon a system which he first introduced into the House of Commons—which, however, has not yet been followed by any other Member, and which I trust will be a solitary precedent. The plan of the hon. Gentleman, when he wishes to cast odium on his opponents, is always to make quotations from some newspaper which habitually opposes the Government; and, having done that, to insinuate that they have been written by members of the Government. I must say that the first time the hon. Gentleman had recourse to that device I was amused by its airy gaiety and supple audacity of invention. But it has become so habitual to him that he seems to be always thinking of newspapers, and to believe that the world is governed by newspapers—which is the real cause of all the mistakes of his career, because he always assumes that newspapers are public opinion. I believe, however, that when the appeal, from which he expects certain results, is made to the new constituencies, the hon. Gentleman will find that he has been entirely misled by trusting to the calculations and representations of newspapers. So far as the Government are concerned, I hope that in future, when the hon. Gentleman imputes to us the communication of articles which he describes as the manifestoes of our opinions—I hope that he will not make his quotations from journals which habitually oppose Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Calne, in a speech which he made to-night, and which was characterized by all that amenity of manner and suavity of demeanour which render him such a favourite with the House, seemed to throw some new light upon certain events in this House; for he told us that the vote on the Resolutions on the Irish Church was not, as it has been described by the hon. Member for Birmingham and other Gentlemen, the expression of a profound conviction and statesmanlike opinion on a most important subject, but that it was in reality a vote of Want of Confidence in the Government. Now I say that if you wish to pass a vote of Want of Confidence in the Government, it would be more satisfactory to the country, and I believe, also, to the majority of this House, that it should be a straightforward vote. For what happens when we have these sinister votes of Want of Confidence—if, indeed, this be a vote of Want of Confidence? When the Government are beaten by a considerable majority, then, according to the right hon. Member for Calne, it is a vote of Want of Confidence; but, speaking from my own personal experience alone—and I dare say my Colleagues and friends could testify to many other instances—I may say that I have received a variety of communications from Gentlemen who voted, no doubt, from conscience and conviction on the Irish Church question, and who gave that large majority to the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and those communications state that they did not thereby intend in any way whatever to imply a general want of confidence in the Government. Therefore, there ought to be no mistake or misunderstanding on such a subject. If you wish to pass a vote of Want of Confidence, propose a vote of Want of Confidence. Let the case be fairly argued, let the House give a deliberate opinion on the subject, and let the country judge. But if votes like those which have lately been given in this House, and which I believe are conscientious votes, on a subject of the greatest importance, are to be suddenly transformed and metamorphosed into votes of Want of Confidence, we shall be getting into a habit which cannot increase the reputation of the House for candour, or enable us to carry on our affairs in that manner which I think has been on the whole satisfactory.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. CARDWELL: I rise Sir, for the purpose of asking the right hon. Gentleman to state with perfect clearness a point on which I am not sure we have entirely understood him. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say he has been informed by some person of legal knowledge and great acquaintance with electioneering matters that it would be impossible, if the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills and the Boundary Bill were proceeded with, to take measures for a dissolution in November. In answer to that an objection was raised by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Sir Robert Collier), which he believes to be a difficulty in the way of proceeding in that matter. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that on this point he will consult either the Law Officers of the Crown or, at any rate, legal gentlemen on whose opinion he can positively rely, and that, on an early occasion, he will state to the House the precise course which it is the intention of the Government to take.

MR. DISRAELI: Yes.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he was unable to see the great importance of what was termed an early dissolution. It implied that business would be slurred over. There would be an untimely "massacre of innocents," and the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills would be hurried through. Of course the question of the Irish Church must go before the new constituencies; but that was no reason why the present House of Commons should not dispassionately and thoroughly settle the other important questions now under the consideration of Parliament.

MR. GLADSTONE remarked that nothing had been said about the Order for the resumption of the Committee on the Resolutions on the Irish Church, and expressed a hope that they might be proceeded with on Thursday.

MR. DISRAELI replied that the right

hon. Gentleman should certainly have Thursday if an earlier day cannot be obtained.

MR. AYRTON inquired what would be the course of the business of the evening?

MR. DISRAELI: After the Committee of Ways and Means we shall go on with the Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill. With regard to the Boundary Bill, representations have been made to me by hon. Members opposite. I believe it would be very inconvenient to them to have the Boundary Bill to-night. Therefore I will not press that; but I hope we shall go on with the representation of the People (Ireland) Bill.

MR. BRIGHT: At what hour?

MR. DISRAELI: Not after eleven o'clock.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

WAYS AND MEANS—COMMITTEE.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Moved, That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there shall be charged, collected, and paid for one year, commencing on the 6th day of April 1868, for and in respect of all Property, Profits, and Gains mentioned or described as chargeable in the Act passed in the 16th and 17th years of Her Majesty's reign, chapter 34, for granting to Her Majesty Duties on Profits arising from Property, Professions, Trades, and Offices, the following Rates and Duties (that is to say):

For every Twenty shillings of the annual value or amount of all such Property, Profits, and Gains (except those chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act), the Rate or Duty of Six pence.

And for and in respect of the occupation of Lands, Tenements, Hereditaments, and Heritages chargeable under Schedule (B) of the said Act, for every Twenty shillings of the annual value thereof,

In England, the Rate or Duty of Three pence, and

In Scotland and Ireland respectively, the Rate or Duty of Two pence farthing.

Subject to the provisions contained in Section 3 of the Act 26th Victoria, chapter 22, for the exemption of persons whose whole Income from every source is under £100 a-year, and relief of those whose Income is under £200 a-year.

MR. GLADSTONE said, this is the most proper opportunity for those who are so disposed to offer any remarks on the finances of the country. I should have been desirous, in the circumstances of the present Session, to have dispensed, if it had been possible, with the remarks I am about to offer; but it is not, and I am the more absolutely compelled to make them in consequence of a conversation the other night after I had left the Committee, when opinions appear to have been expressed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer which appear to me to be entirely at variance with the practice and with the understanding of the House as to the relations between the Executive Government and Independent Members. I wish to explain what some of my Friends have done with respect to the expenditure proposed by the present Government since it assumed Office, and to state why I have not carried further the objections I have made to their system. Upon various occasions I have objected to the expenditure proposed by the Government, during the last Session of Parliament in particular. When the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) and other hon. Members highly competent to examine the question, were desirous of challenging upon an important point the Naval Estimates, we found—conformably with my Parliamentary experience upon other occasions—that the circumstances of last year were such as made it scarcely possible to question, in an effective manner, the system of expenditure which the Government proposed. When they, upon their own responsibility, state that certain establishments are necessary for the defence of the country—when, for instance, they propose rapid and wholesale armament, and large additions to the pay of the Army, upon the ground that, in their judgment, the increase is necessary to efficiency—it is quite obvious that such expenditure can be effectually challenged only by those who are prepared to bear the responsibility of the construction that will be put upon their resistance to the measures of the Government; and that construction is, that they propose a Vote of Want of Confidence. No Government could be worthy of its place, if it permitted its Estimates to be seriously resisted by the Opposition; and important changes can be made only under circumstances which permit of the raising of the question of a change of Government. Last year it was impossible to raise that question; so absorbing was the interest attaching to the question of Parliamentary Reform that it was quite impracticable to raise any second issue; and, therefore, we had no choice but to leave the Government to its course, or else to incur the responsibility of doing that which we admitted, after the downfall of the previous Government, could not and ought not to be done—namely, to take out of the hands of the Government the settlement of the question of Reform. Further, although it may have the appearance of a paradox, I believe it will be found by experience that when the attention of the House is absorbed by one great question it is impossible to secure the adequate consideration of another question of first-rate importance. Under these circumstances it is obvious the responsibility of the Government for expenditure was raised to the highest point; but to my astonishment, the doctrine seems to have been laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that, when once the Estimates have been accepted by Independent Members, the House is responsible for them in the same degree as the Ministers of the Crown. It is impossible too emphatically to pronounce against that opinion; it is entirely contrary to the relation in which he stands to the House. The doctrine is monstrous, and is unsupported by the authority of the predecessors of the right hon. Gentleman, whose good sense will convince him that it cannot be maintained. The Government have unlimited opportunities of investigating the Estimates for the expenditure through Departments under the supposed control of the Treasury, and how is it possible that those who have no such power, even if they agree to the Estimates, can be responsible in the same degree as the Government? If ever there were circumstances under which a Government was responsible for expenditure they are the circumstances before us, partly because of the Reform Bill, and above all, because the Opposition did not press expenditure upon the Government. When we were in Office incessant attacks were made upon us to promote expenditure, and our proposals for reduction—for instance, in the Vote for the Yeomanry—were resisted. On the other hand, the present Administration has experienced no such general pressure, and no impediments have been placed in the way of its reducing the expenditure. I say this advisedly and deliberately, and challenge reference to the Motions, Questions, and Divisions of the last ten years. The hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. White), referring to a statement I made on the night when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer submitted his Financial Statement, appeared to think that in some manner I had overstated my case. My proposition was that, if it had not been for the increase in the Estimates introduced by the present Government, the right hon. Gentleman need not have been placed in the painful position of asking us to add 2d. to the Income Tax. That statement, I think, is strictly and literally correct; in point of fact it is rather an under-statement than an over-statement. There has been added to the Estimates £2,750,000, of which £1,930,000 was required, according to the figures of the right hon. Gentleman, for the Abyssinian War. The gross amount required for the Abyssinian War was £3,000,000, and £1,070,000 having been provided in November, £1,930,000 constitutes the amount now required for the purposes of the Abyssinian War. That being so, it appears to me perfectly plain that if, instead of increasing the Estimates for other purposes than those of the Abyssinian War by, in round numbers, £1,000,000, the Government had so reduced them as to bring them only half-way towards the amount of our Estimates, the sum required for the Abyssinian War might have been provided without any increase in the total Estimates. In truth, I have under-stated the case, because I have taken for my standard of comparison the Estimates for the year 1866, whereas the House is entitled to assume that the Estimates subsequent to that year should have undergone still further reduction in place of being increased. When a general movement for economy was made under the auspices of the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) and others, the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends were ready to pledge themselves to the principle that there ought to be a progressive and gradual reduction in the Estimates from year to year, and, indeed, boasted that they had forced that principle upon us; but the moment they get the control over the public purse that control seems perfectly worthless, and a systematic increase of expenditure is made with regard to the naval, the military, and the civil Departments of the country. I repeat that that increase in the expenditure is a systematic one—and do not let the House think that the increase we see now shows the real extent of that increase. My experience has taught me that these rapid augmentations of the expenditure contain the seeds of further augmentations. If the present Government remain long in Office they will bequeath to their successors a progressive augmenting expenditure. We left to our successors a progressively diminishing expenditure. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: That is not correct.]

Mr. Gladstone

Well, now, you shall have it. In the first place, I say I claim no credit for the diminution of the expenditure which we effected. I am not proud of it. I do not think we did much. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Baronet jeers when I say that. I repeat that I claim no praise or credit for what we effected in that respect, but I will set up a standard by which what we accomplished may be tried, and then the right hon. Gentleman may judge whether or not dispraise and discredit do not attach to those who sit opposite to me for augmenting the expenditure, instead of adopting the principle we had followed of gradually and progressively diminishing the expenditure. We came into office in 1859, when we found that the Estimates involved a vast increase in the expenditure. For that the Government which then preceded us were not to blame; the Estimates had been in a manner prepared for them, and were adopted by Parliament and the whole country. The Estimates of that year were increased by a large sum, which was required for the China War, which began either a few days before, or a few days after, we succeeded to Office. The expenditure for the official year ending March 31st, 1860, was £69,523,000; for the year 1861, £72,792,000, that being the largest expenditure for the year we have had, and of which £4,000,000, was due to the China War; for 1862, £71,374,000, including £1,000,000 incurred for the expedition to Canada and British North America after the affair of the Trent; for 1863, £69,302,000; for 1864, £67,056,000; for 1865, £66,462,000; and for 1866, £65,914,000. That is the last year of expenditure under our control, and I ask the right hon. Baronet opposite whether I have not made out my statement that we left to our successors a gradually and progressively diminishing expenditure? We may have been but poor performers, but it seems that there are still poorer performers than ourselves. We had thus brought the expenditure down from £72,000,000 to a little under £66,000,000; but the real reduction in the expenditure was even greater than is apparent from the figures, in consequence of an alteration we effected in the accounts, bringing into them sums of money on both which had not previously appeared in them on either side. But what has been the result of the operation of the present Government? We left them in 1866 with a diminishing expenditure of £65,914,000. In 1867, we find that the expenditure has risen to £66,780,000, and in 1868 to £69,242,000, exclusive of the expenditure incurred in respect of the Abyssinian War. I believe, I am accurate in saying that the £2,000,000 Vote of Credit includes the whole Abyssinian expenditure for that year. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I believe that is correct.] Perhaps there may turn out to be some small accounts for supplies sent from this country which are not included in that sum, but they cannot amount to much. On the 31st of March, 1868, Her Majesty's Government had been twenty months in Office, and in that time they had raised the expenditure from £65,914,000 in 1866 to what it was in 1863 — namely, to something over £69,000,000 — that is to say, they had contrived to throw back the expenditure of the country three years during a tenure of Office of twenty months. Let me ask, does anyone in this House believe that that increase is due to mere casual expenditure? The right hon. Gentleman opposite says that the additional expenditure was all required to secure the efficiency of the Army, the Navy, and the Civil Services. It is not the increase in the efficiency of the Army that has carried off the palm in this great, rapid, and menacing expenditure. If those in office do not mend their ways a "financial crisis" will take place in this House, which will render it impossible for the Public Business to be carried on by them in the face of this large and increasing expenditure. But how do the Estimates stand for the ensuing year? They amount to £70,428,000, exclusive of £3,000,000 for Abyssinia. When I held the Office of Chancellor of the Exchequer I found that the Revenue of the country increased at the rate of about £1,500,000 per annum, some part of which depended upon a consistent endeavour to open up new sources of receipts, and another portion upon what I may call minor reforms. Even during the past year, as the right hon. Gentleman has informed us, the Revenue of the country has increased to a certain extent. Now, as £1,500,000 per annum amounts in two years to £3,000,000, which is the exact amount of the increase on the expenditure which Her Majesty's Government have effected, being, I suppose, just about what they believe they can safely spend in respect of the augmentation of the Revenue of the country. [Ironical Cheers.] Sarcastic cheers may be all very well, but the figures speak for themselves. The right hon. Gentleman will say that the expenditure has been rendered necessary in order to secure the efficiency of the services. [Cheers.] Yes, that cry has cost the country a great deal of money, and it may cost it a good deal more. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: The expenditure in my Department will be more than it is now.] The right hon. Baronet has just made an important announcement, for he has informed us that this efficiency of the services will cost us much more. [Sir JOHN PAKINGTON: I will explain my statement by-and-by.] I shall be glad if the explanation of the right hon. Baronet will destroy the effect of the words I have, I believe fairly, quoted. The state of the expenditure is such as we should deeply deplore; and I do not hesitate to tell the right hon. Gentleman that irrespective of party and of support I should have been ready distinctly to challenge the Government on the system that is now being carried on of increasing the expenditure on the naval, military, and civil services, had it not been for the great absorbing question relating to the state of Ireland. Upon that subject I will not now dwell. When we came into Office last we had to contend with and check the fever of expenditure which had seized upon the country, and which had induced Parliament to spend £6,000,000 or £8,000,000 upon harbours of refuge. We did this — the Liberal party did this — while, as we think, we perfectly maintained the efficiency of the public service, at the same time regularly effecting great reductions through five or six years, which we had the prospect of continuing — a policy which was much better than absorbing by additions to the expenditure all the natural growth of the Revenue of the country.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I am sure the Committee will allow me to offer some few remarks in answer to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and in doing so I feel deeply sensible how efficient an advocate the right hon. Gentleman is for economy in the public service; and I can assure him I give him full credit for the efforts he has constantly made for reducing the national expenditure, except so far as I think those efforts have not been consistent with that support of our national armaments which he will himself admit to be one of the first duties of every Administration. The right hon. Gentleman charged the present Administration in no measured terms with systematic extravagance. That was the substance of his charge. He said that the reduction of expenditure by the late Government was gradual and steady from 1860 to 1866, and he proceeded to say that the present Government were bound in duty to continue that diminution. Then he proceeded to say, what I thought rather harsh and uncalled for under the circumstances, that the state of our present expenditure was a subject of discredit and dispraise to the present Government.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not mean to use the words in any offensive sense. I meant they were not entitled to credit or praise.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The right hon. Gentleman said it was a subject of discredit and dispraise to the present Government. I think I have some reason to complain that the right hon. Gentleman alluded to the Department under my superintendence. He said no small part of the discredit rested on the War Department. I must say it would have been fairer and more consistent with the usual practice of the House if the right hon. Gentleman had given some intimation of his intention to bring forward this subject. I had not the slightest idea that this subject would be mooted in the House of Commons this evening till I heard of it by mere accident half an hour before coming down to the House. The right hon. Gentleman intimated in the course of some former debate that he might draw attention to the subject; but then three Departments—the Army, the Navy, and the Treasury were involved. I hoped that if he had any exception to take to the administration of the Department with which I am connected, he would bring it forward in a straightforward manner, and not, as he has now done, without the ordinary notice which the courtesy of the House requires. I have Papers in my house which I could have brought down and made use of in answer to every charge he might think it proper to bring against the War Department, but to which I was utterly unable to turn at the moment. No Member of the House is bound to know what may have dropped in debate. We are accustomed to give proper notice on the Paper whenever any public Department is to be called in question. Some of the Papers to which I have alluded would not only have enabled me to meet the right hon. Gentleman's statement, but would have fully justified the expressions I used a short time ago when I said a further increase of expenditure had become indispensably necessary. I do not shrink from that expression. The subject was debated in this House year after year—I mean the subject of the enormous expenditure in which the country was involved by the policy, not of the present or any former Conservative Administration, but of the Palmerston Government—in which the right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer—with respect to the fortifications of the country. The Government of Lord Palmerston resolved on a great expenditure, which was now going on, for the erection of fortifications which were held to be indispensable for the protection of our arsenals. I never found fault with the Government for adopting that policy. I always thought Lord Palmerston was right. But that is not the point now. What I wish to call attention to is this: that the arrangement made by the Government of Lord Palmerston was that, for the expense of erecting such fortifications, a loan should be raised, but that the cost of arming the fortifications should be borne by the annual revenue of the country, as I hope to be able to show the Committee that this accounts in a very large degree for the increase in the Estimates, and will be the cause of a still larger increase. Fortifications unarmed were of little use, and what did the late Government do towards arming them? For several years they did nothing. If I remember rightly, it was in 1860 that the policy of these fortifications was decided on; but nothing was done in that direction until 1865-6. In one respect I think this was fortunate—although I cannot give the late Government the credit of that, because they could not foresee the extraordinary changes that were to be made in the power of the artillery of the country. It was fortunate they did nothing, because it is very probable that if they had proceeded to a large expenditure in the years between 1860 and 1865-6, they would have expended their money in armaments comparatively of no value. In 1865-6 the Government did, to a small extent, commence providing armaments for these fortifications. In the financial years 1865, 1866, and 1867, 107 guns were provided for the armament of these fortifications. In the financial year 1867-8, after the change of the Government, ninety-seven guns were provided, and in the present year no fewer than ninety-nine guns were provided. During the four years that have elapsed from 1865 to the present year provision has been made for the manufacture of 366 guns of large calibre for the fortifications. According to the calculation of scientific men competent to give an opinion on the subject, it will be necessary, in order to arm the fortifications which are being constructed, to provide 1,044 additional guns of large calibre—12-inch, 9-inch, and 7-inch guns, and also 2,500 guns of a lighter character. The right hon. Gentleman says that if a change of Government occurs, the future Government must effect a large reduction of expenditure. Now, any future Government must and ought to endeavour to effect every economy consistent with the efficiency of the public service; but I presume that the right hon. Gentleman will not be prepared to contend that we are to leave the fortifications of this country without guns in them. It is the duty of the Government to arm these fortifications; and this aggregate number of 3,500 guns of large and small calibre, indispensable as they are for the safety and protection of the country, cannot be manufactured under an expenditure of from £4,000,000 to £5,000,000. That is a plain statement, which cannot be controverted, and which, I think, the right hon. Gentleman will acknowledge, justifies my interruption of him just now, when I said that a further expenditure would be necessary. I challenge contradiction to the statements I have made, from the right hon. Gentleman or anyone else. Hon. Gentlemen opposite sometimes talk of increased Estimates, as if it were an optional matter with the Ministry to have large or small Estimates. Now, the real question is not whether we like large or small Estimates; but whether we are to do our duty in providing for the necessary wants of the country. I had just time to turn, not having had notice of this attack, to a passage in a late Report made to me from the Ordnance Select Committee, the head of which is one of the most able and experienced officers in this country—I mean General Lefroy. He says—

“Much of the expense incurred by the Ordnance Select Committee is inherent in the costly nature of the material now employed. Down to 1858 we had no gun in use that cost much more than £100; we have this year paid about £7,000 for two guns.”

Let me add that these two guns were ordered, not by the present, but by the late Government. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to grumble and make accusations; but we must either leave off providing the country with artillery, or submit to increased Estimates; for it is evident that the expenditure for artillery of ten years ago is not applicable to the present time. Then General Lefroy adds, going still back a few years—

Sir John Pakington

“A charge of powder and shot rarely cost above 15s., now every shot from a 9-inch gun costs at least 84 6s., and in the 12-inch gun about £7 12s. Many varieties of projectiles which we are obliged to fire cost a great deal more. The ammunition alone required to test a 9-inch gun for strength and endurance, a process that must be gone through, costs over £1,300. Turning back to guns tested as late as 1860, I find it cost about £150.”

These are facts to which I speak upon competent authority, and they show that you must either leave off supplying the country with artillery, or you must have increased Estimates. If the cost of testing a 9-inch gun is £1,300—[A laugh—] it is very easy to laugh; but I am stating all this on the highest authority. The cost of testing a 12-inch gun will be proportionately larger—certainly upwards of £2,000. In the face of such facts how can you wonder that a Government finds increased Estimates inevitable? Then, let me remind the Committee of the state of affairs respecting our small-arms when the present Government came into Office. The late Government had done next to nothing in providing this country with breech-loading rifles. Previous to the change of Government, the late Minister for War had ordered the conversion by hand of 40,000 small-arms into breech-loaders, at a cost of £12 a gun. Of these only nineteen or twenty were finished. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) took Office, he proceeded to provide the British army with the indispensable breech-loader; but, instead of their being converted by hand at an expense of £12 per gun, the conversion was effected at a trifle under £1 a gun, and several hundred thousand were converted. Of course, in consequence of the number converted, a large expense was incurred, and the Estimates were increased. Now I will pass to another subject. I have here a return of the number of men below the establishment of the Army at the close of several financial years. In 1860-1 the difference between the effective numbers and the establishment was 129 officers and men; in the year following 929; in 1862-3, 3,724; in 1863-4, 5,606; in 1864-5, 5,946; in 1865-6, 6,884; in 1866-7, 1,358. This was a state of things which could not be allowed to continue. It arose from a difficulty in obtaining recruits. Under the administration of the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) a Commission was appointed on the subject of recruiting, which reported that increased expenditure must be incurred in order that men might be induced to enter the army. My right hon. and gallant Friend (General Peel) merely changed the form of that increased expenditure; the principle had been laid down by the Commission of the noble Lord. My right hon. Friend, with the full sanction of the House, and without any objection on the part of the late Government, increased the pay of the soldier by 2*d.* per day, and thereby added £500,000 a-year to the Estimates. Well, that was a great addition to our expenditure; but it arose from the cause which makes the army of England the most expensive army in Europe. There is no doubt of that fact—it is admitted by every one; but the reason should not be forgotten. It is the price which you pay for an army recruited by voluntary enlistment. If you examine the state of the armies of France and Prussia, you will find that their cost, man for man, is not half of the cost of the army of England. But the armies of these countries are recruited by means which we should consider a violation of the liberty of the subject, means which we in this country could not think of resorting to unless under the pressure of a great national emergency. Therefore, I say your course as regards this expenditure is clear. If you like to change the system of recruiting for the British army and adopt conscription, your expenses will be less; but if you choose to go on as you do now—and, for my parts I hope we shall never change the system, for I greatly prefer voluntary enlistment—then you must pay the cost. It was found by my right hon. and gallant Friend (General Peel), and all were agreed on the point, that the pay given to the British army was not sufficient. With the general concurrence of Parliament my right hon. Friend, by the change which he wisely made, added £500,000 to the expenditure of the country. There are other points which, if I had had notice of the attack of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, I could have explained. I have touched only on questions which affect the Department with which I am connected, and I hope I have shown the Committee that there are reasons why it is impossible, under existing circumstances, to maintain the military establishments and defences of the country at a less cost. I say, you may economize in other respects; but no one will dispute that if you have fortifications you must arm them; and you cannot control the enormous increase in the expense of all such armaments which has occurred within the last few years. We may lament the fact that our expenditure should be increased, but I fear the circumstances are too strong for us, and I hold that the present Government are not open to the charge made by the right hon. Gentleman, of having wantonly and unnecessarily increased the expenditure of the country.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he should be speaking within the recollection of the Committee if he said that a portion of the challenge which had resulted in that discussion had come from the Chancellor of the Exchequer in replying to some observations which had been made by his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) on the introduction of the Budget. The right hon. Baronet who had just sat down was absent on that occasion from a cause which they all regretted. The right hon. Baronet had said that he was not bound to know what occurred in the debates in that House. Now, he (Mr. Goschen) took it that every Member of that House was bound to make himself acquainted with what passed there, especially upon matters of such importance as those which had been raised in the discussion to-night. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had asked the Committee to agree to a Resolution for an increase in the Income Tax, and the objection which his right hon. Friend the Member for South Lancashire had raised on the occasion of the introduction of the Budget was whether that increase of the Income Tax was not really caused by an increase of expenditure. He took it for granted that in every general discussion of finance it was necessary to treat at the same time the expenditure itself and the means by which it was proposed that expenditure should be met. Every individual, when he dealt with a question of his own income, was bound to look to both sides of the account; he was bound to consider how new expenditure was to be met, and if he had no fresh resources, then he ought to see how his expenditure was to be reduced. So in the case of the Budget it was essential to consider how far the proposed expenditure was necessary, and how the taxation consequent upon it was to be raised, or whether the taxation might not be reduced by curtailing the expenditure. The right hon. Baronet, however, had only pointed to the increase of expenditure, and shown, what was the truth, that the cost for the armaments now was infinitely greater than it used to be. But if they were to admit that every gun would cost so many hundred pounds more than before, then they would probably think that they should want very much fewer guns. If we were to require as many monster guns as small guns, then, indeed, the prospect before the country was bad. But the right hon. Baronet had not pointed out that the increase in the Estimates of the last two years was due in any appreciable degree to the increased outlay upon guns. The right hon. Baronet had said that only eighty-five guns had been provided in a year by the late Government, while ninety-nine had been provided by their successors. But that was only a difference of fourteen guns, and how could it affect so materially the Estimates of the last two years? The cost of these fourteen guns could account for but a small portion of that difference of £1,250,000. The expense for the 3,000 guns that would be required for the fortifications apparently would fall upon future Estimates, and was not in any degree borne by the Estimates of the last two years. The right hon. Baronet had spoken of the conversion of the rifles. Well, that accounted for a certain increase in the Estimates one year, but the year after the increase was as great as ever. [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: The conversion is going on now.] As far as he had been able to observe that was always the case—what was "extraordinary" one year became "ordinary" in the next—when any special expenditure had been incurred one year it would be found repeated in the next year, instead of the expenditure being reduced. Another matter he wished to point out was that notwithstanding this enormous expenditure on the army and navy, which he was afraid would be increased by millions, nothing was ever found ready. If there was to be a new expedition they would have to incur an extraordinary expenditure besides. The right hon. Baronet had said, what was perfectly true, that the British Army must always cost much more than foreign armies, on account of our system of voluntary enlistment. But he would like to know how much of our Estimates were really due to the keep and pay of the soldier. He confessed that the prospects which the right hon. Baronet held out for the future were not very satisfactory, and if £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 were to be added to our present Estimates, he was surprised that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in bringing forward his scheme of finance, had not shown how that expenditure was to be met. He congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the conclusion of the Abyssinian War; but still he did not see any prospect of the balances which had been reduced since the present Government had been in office being brought up to the old point under the financial administration of the right hon. Gentleman. The Estimates of the present year were regarded as extraordinary Estimates, and reductions in next year's Estimates were looked forward to; but it unfortunately appeared that the right hon. Baronet could hold out no hope of any reduction next year. On the contrary, if the right hon. Baronet should think it his duty to push forward the manufacture of guns with increased rapidity, £1,000,000 or more might be added to next year's Estimates. He would not say one word against the policy of this Income Tax, if the calculations made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer were correct, and the tax was only to be temporary; but he thought it extremely fortunate that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) had raised the present discussion, and had elicited what was the state of the War Estimates, for without information on that point it was impossible to judge fairly of the plan of finance laid before the House.

Mfr. Goschen

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON explained that the two guns which cost £7,000 were exceptional guns; and though guns were now immensely dearer than they were twenty years ago, he should be sorry to have it supposed that the price paid for those two represented the average price of guns.

MR. CORRY: Sir, if my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had reason to question the course pursued of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), still stronger is my own ground of complaint, because that right hon. Gentleman has attacked the Estimates for which I am primarily responsible without having heard a word in explanation of them, as I have not yet had an opportunity of making my statement to the House. I will now, however, specify some causes of increased expenditure under several heads, of which I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman is absolutely ignorant. In Vote No. 1 of the Navy Estimates, although there is a reduction of about 2,500 men as compared with last year, and of 2,200 as compared with the year 1866, there is an increase in the amount to be voted for wages. This increase has arisen from different causes. Under various Orders in Council there has been an increase of pay to medical officers—which increase was indispensable in order to secure the services of competent officers—to navigating officers, to naval instructors, to artificers—so necessary in our armour-clad ships—and to the Royal Marines. The last item alone amounted to £68,000, and the total increase in the amount of wages, as compared with 1866-7, was little short of £130,000. In the Vote for victuals there is also an increase in consequence of the increase in the price of victuals. For that the Government are not responsible: of course, they could not starve the men. In Vote No. 11 (for Works in Dockyards), there is a decrease of £78,000 as compared with the Estimate for 1866, notwithstanding that the expenditure on the four great works at Chatham, Portsmouth, Malta, and Bermuda—all undertaken by the late Government, and the expenditure which is regulated by Act of Parliament—exceeds the amount taken in the Estimates of 1866-7 by £86,000. In Vote No. 14, a sum of £50,000 is taken for an iron armour-clad vessel building for Victoria, New South Wales; but, on the other hand, a corresponding decrease of nearly the same amount is made under Vote No. 17. There is a decrease of £150,000 for labour and materials in the dockyards; but, on the other hand, there is an increase of £750,000 for armour-clads as compared with the year 1866; and this is the secret of the increase in the Navy Estimates for the present year, as compared with the Estimates for 1866-7, which were prepared under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman. The question is, was the Navy in 1866 in a satisfactory condition? I do not like to enter into comparisons between ourselves and other countries; and yet I think it would be false delicacy not to refer to the state of other navies as well as our own. The late Mr. Cobden had the good sense to say that our navy ought materially to exceed the navy of France in strength. From the information I have received from a source which I shall not mention, but which is an authentic one, I found that, whereas, when I prepared my Estimates, the armour-clad navy of England comprised twenty-two first and second-class ships afloat; that of France consisted also of twenty-two first and second-class ships. Of the smaller classes of armoured ships we had nine, while France had thirteen. Therefore France had four more iron-clad ships afloat than we had. Then, again, in respect to iron-clad ships in course of building, we had six and France had seven ships of the first and second-class, while of the smaller class France had four and we had none. The general result, therefore, of the comparison in regard to armoured ships built and building was, that England had thirty-seven and France forty-six. The House will agree with me in thinking that that is not a satisfactory state of things. Then came another question—namely, that of the reserve of ships in the ports. I am not imputing blame to the late Government, I wish only to state facts; but when I entered on the duties of my present Office the reserve of ships in the ports, exclusive of two or three small vessels that were fitting for reliefs to ships about to be paid off, was nil. This state of things was as abnormal as it was dangerous. During the Government of Sir Robert Peel, who kept a watchful eye over the expenditure of all the Departments, it was thought necessary to maintain a reserve of thirty ships of the line, some of them ready to go to sea at a few hours' notice, others in a few days, and the rest in a fortnight. Nor was that merely a Tory policy; for in 1848, when Lord John Russell was in power, a question arose whether so large a reserve was necessary, and the decision was that it should be maintained. Again, in 1859, when my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War was the First Lord of the Admiralty, and when the Italian War broke out, it was thought necessary to increase our force of ships in commission; and we sent out from the dockyards twenty-eight ships in the course of a few months, of which fifteen were line-of-battle ships. Indeed, there can be no safety for this country in a time of emergency unless we maintain a sufficient reserve of ships in the dockyards ready to be commissioned if required. Therefore, in the Estimates which I shall propose as soon as I have an opportunity, we provide for a considerable reserve of armour-clad ships in our ports. I should observe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War has had to incur a heavy expenditure in providing guns not only for the fortifications, but also for the navy which has undergone a complete change of armament, and that in the naval Department the cost of fitting the ships for their new armament has been a very heavy item of expenditure. I think, therefore, I have shown that there is some reason for increased expenditure; and with these general observations I shall reserve further explanations till I come to propose the Navy Estimates for the year.

MR. SAMUDA said, that, notwithstanding the great necessity which the First Lord of the Admiralty alleged to exist for strengthening the navy, the work proposed to be performed in the dockyards was reduced from 24,000 to 14,000 tons, the saving to be effected by which reduction might be roughly calculated at nearly £500,000.

MR. CORY explained that he had spoken principally of works to be executed by contract, and not in the dockyards.

MR. SAMUDA said, it was true that £245,000 was taken in the Estimates to be expended on contract ships this year beyond the sum so spent last year; but if he took from the saving in the dockyards the amount proposed to be spent on contract ships, there ought to be a reduction of from £200,000 to £250,000 in the Estimates; instead of which there was an increase of £200,000. He was astonished to hear from the Secretary of State for War that they might expect to pay no less a sum than £4,000,000 for guns for the fortifications, and he maintained that the question of those fortifications demanded careful revision. He was surprised to hear that no less than £1,300 would be required for testing the 9-inch gun, and £2,000 for the 12-inch gun. It would be impossible in time of emergency to furnish an adequate garrison to man and fight those guns. He believed the best policy in view of invasion would be the carrying of our defences further inland, so as to increase the distance between the point of disembarkation and the place of attack. It was a matter for serious consideration whether a number of arsenals and dockyards which could only be available in time of peace ought to be maintained. Such places as Pembroke, Chatham, and Woolwich might be preserved, but Portsmouth and Plymouth would be rendered untenable in time of war if the war was of a severe or aggravated character.

Mr. Corry

GENERAL PEEL: Sir, I am under a disadvantage, not only in being unprepared for the debate, but in not having heard that debate. It appears to me that speeches on fortifications have no reference whatever to the subject before us—namely, the increase of the annual expenditure. The present Government have no responsibility whatever with regard to those fortifications. They were decided upon by Lord Palmerston's Government, and on taking Office I distinctly disclaimed all responsibility for them. The hon. Gentlemen who spoke last does not seem to be aware that though the sum necessary for the erection of the fortifications was proposed to be provided by money raised by a loan, the armament for them was to be provided for out of the annual Estimates. The original Estimate for that armament was £1,885,000; but when I came into Office in 1866, only £85,000 of that sum had been charged in the Estimates. The country was a gainer by the delay; for otherwise there would probably have been a very bad gun at three times the cost that was ultimately incurred: but it is not fair to turn round on the Government and blame them for an increase in the Estimates because they have provided this armament. I think that had I been present when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) spoke, I should have been able to show that it was not only very unreasonable, but very unwise, to make a comparison between the expenditure of his Government and of the present one. When I came into Office in 1859 the total expenditure for which I was responsible was £13,500,000, but the expenditure in that Department went on increasing while the right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer to £16,000,000 and upwards; and in 1866 our armaments were in much the same position that they had been in 1859. When I came into Office we had not a single rifled gun. I introduced those 12-pounder Armstrong guns which have, I hope to hear in the course of a few days, been so very effectual in Abyssinia; but the Government of the day, though urged to wait for some further trials, went in for the larger Armstrong guns, which cost upwards of £3,000,000, and all of which proved a failure. As to a comparison of Estimates, it must be remembered that Estimates are only an approximate calculation as to the cost of contemplated works. If you construct the works for a smaller sum than the Estimate, of course that is a saving; but if you do not construct necessary works at all, there is no saving. Now, in 1865-6 there was a saving of £500,000 in the manufacturing department; but that saving was owing to the partial suspension of operations in the Royal carriage and other factories, through the pattern of wrought-iron gun carriages not having been determined upon, and through other changes being anticipated. But because such expenditure was deferred, is it right to turn round on the Government and blame them for the outlay which was ultimately necessary? Then as to the increase of pay, that followed upon the Report of the Royal Commission on Recruiting; and that Commission was appointed because you could not get enough recruits. For my own part, I shall always recollect with pride the part I took in providing better weapons, and in granting the soldiers increased pay.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that, not having heard the remarks either of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) or of the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington), he would not now attempt to enter into the discussion; but he should be ready on another occasion to discuss the points which had been raised. As to the large increase in the Votes for Army Purposes having arisen from the necessity of supplying large guns and from the increased pay of the troops, he maintained that those two items did not account for the whole, or nearly the whole, of that increase. He always contemplated the probability of a large additional expenditure for the supply of heavy guns for naval purposes and for arming our fortifications; but it was hardly fair to blame the late Government for not taking action in the matter. Their principle was to provide the armament for the ships and fortifications which would be ready within the year, and this was the most prudent course that could have been pursued. As he had before remarked, it was easy to find good reasons for increasing any particular Vote; but those on whom the responsibility rested were bound, not only to see in what way money could be usefully expended, but in what way it could be usefully saved. He did not say that it would have been possible for the late Government to practise greater economy than the present, but the two items which had been referred to did not account for the total increase; and it rested with the Government to show, not only that extra expenditure was necessary in those items, but that retrenchment was impossible in others.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, he attributed the present excessive expenditure, to a great extent, to the outlay incurred in fortifications. The misfortune was that Parliament legislated on that subject during a panic. The House were now defraying the expense of that legislation; and it was very hard upon a Government which had not proposed the fortifications to have to incur the unpopularity of the Vote for arming them. According to the evidence of Sir Richard Airey before the Commission on Fortifications, when the embrasures in the fortifications had been made, there was not one gunner in the service, for every gun it was proposed to mount in them. As to the fortifications themselves, they somewhat resembled the towers which were seen in different parts of the country, and which were called So and so's "Folly." They were now erected, but it was quite worthy of consideration whether the Government should arm them with guns or not. Another Government, however, having built the forts, the House could not blame the present Government for proposing to put arms into them.

MR. DALGLISH said, that having been one of those who opposed the scheme of these fortifications, he was gratified to find that the general opinion now was that they were a mistake. He wished the Government would consider whether it would not be better to delay for a time providing them with guns.

MR. LAING observed that the discussion had hitherto been directed rather to the army and navy expenditure than to the question of Ways and Means. The broad situation was that, apart from the Abyssinian expenditure, the ordinary Estimates of expenditure had been increased by £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 during the last three or four years; and that not only had a surplus of £2,500,000 disappeared, but the balances had been reduced by about £1,000,000, excluding from the reckoning the Abyssinian outlay. That was not a satisfactory state of things. There were reasons apparent to every one why it would not be fair to charge this increased expenditure upon the present Government, and why a great portion of it was inevitable. This, however, was no reason why they should persist in charging to direct taxation—in other words, to the income tax—the whole of the increased taxation that had become necessary. He had always been in favour of the income tax; but there was danger, at a moment when they were about to enlarge the constituencies of the country, in establishing a precedent for throwing every unexpected or inconvenient amount of expenditure upon direct taxation in the shape of the income tax. During the Crimean War a certain balance was preserved between direct and indirect taxation. He quite agreed that it was not desirable to alter the rate of taxation upon articles of general consumption, or to impose taxes affecting our commerce for a merely temporary object. If, however, this increased scale of taxation were to be maintained in future years, it would be dangerous if a fair proportion were not thrown upon other classes of the community besides those which paid income tax. Another point to which he wished to refer was as to the policy of raising money by taxation for the purpose of reducing the National Debt. When he opposed the Government scheme of last year he did not suppose that his predictions would meet with so speedy a verification. The practical effect had been to add £1,000,000 a year to the charge of the country, which had been withdrawn from the balances, and to borrow £1,000,000 at a higher rate of interest. Where was the difference between such a scheme and Mr. Pitt's sinking fund? To convert a debt into terminable annuities was the scheme of a sinking fund in the worst of all forms. The sound principle was to keep the expenditure down to the lowest point consistent with efficiency; to make the Estimates on such a scale as would ensure a surplus within the year, and then—adjusting the burden of taxation fairly between direct and indirect taxation—to trust to the gradual reduction of the Debt by means of the accruing surplus of the year.

MR. CHILDERS said, that, with respect to the National Debt, the short answer to his hon. Friend (Mr. Laing) was, that for many years the policy of the House of Commons had been to apply a very considerable sum to the reduction of the debt by means of terminable annuities. These had to a great extent fallen in, and the policy of last year was no new policy, but simply an endeavour to redress the balance between permanent and terminable annuities which had become deranged through that falling in. Coming to the question specially before the House, he thought the House had lost sight of the origin of the argument. They had been of late years so accustomed to large surpluses—the average annual balance in favour of the Exchequer having been £2,750,000—that it was difficult to appreciate the fact that they had suddenly dropped into the position of having two years' successive deficits. There were, in fact, three deficits contemplated in the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—a deficit last year, one for the present year, and the Abyssinian deficit. Omitting the expenditure on account of the Abyssinian Expedition altogether, he found that the original Budget expenditure of last year for the various services was £40,233,000, which amount was increased by a supplementary Estimate to £40,449,000. The Budget expenditure for the present year under the same heads was, on the other hand, £41,863,000, from which was to be deducted the difference between the extra receipts which came into the Treasury this year and last year for the navy and the other services, leaving as a net result above £41,050,000—which, compared with the original Estimate of last year, gave an increase in the Budget of the present year—in which the country was informed that there was to be a considerable deficit—of over £800,000. To this might be added the difference between the estimated sales of old materials in the two years, which was against the present Budget. He, for his part, had always insisted that this head of income ought not to be mixed up with expenditure, and ought not to be taken into consideration, when making a comparison of the Estimates of one year with those of another, but the contrary view had been strongly maintained by others; and, taking it to be the right course to adopt, it would be found that the difference between the Estimates of last, and those of the present year, was no less than £1,034,000. Now, that was an increase which he thought justified hon. Members in considering whether or not it was not absolutely necessary that some rigorous measures should be adopted to cut down, where practicable, some portion of the public expenditure. It had been said by more than one hon. Gentleman opposite—that the proposed increases of expenditure were inevitable, and he did not dispute that from year to year it was found to be absolutely impossible to prevent the increase of some items. But it was the part of a wise administrator, when expenditure was inevitable on some heads, to see whether it could be reduced on others. But this is just what hardly appears in any of the Estimates of the present Government. His right hon. Friend opposite (Sir John Pakington) for instance, stated that the guns cost more than they used to do. The question then arose, whether fewer guns might not be required? [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I told you the exact number of guns you would want.] He was about to apply the principle in another direction. It was said that the maintenance of men was more costly than it used to be. The question then came, whether they could not dispense with some of the men? When the right hon. Baronet was at the Admiralty last year there was no reduction in the men. This year the right hon. Gentleman now at the Admiralty made a considerable reduction, while the right hon. Baronet, having been transferred to the War Office, had made no reduction there. The probability was that he was as much in error in the one case as he was in the other. But a plea was put up that the increased expenditure was due to warlike stores. To make quite sure that the comparison was just he had compared all the Votes for this purpose in recent years, and he found that the Estimate for warlike stores was this year £1,491,000, as compared with £1,457,000 in 1865.

Mr. Laing

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: A great deal of the expenditure was laid out, not in the manufacture of guns, but in various items rendered necessary in connection with their alteration.

MR. CHILDERS observed that it was for this reason that he had thrown the two items together; and in the aggregate Vote the whole increase in three years was only £34,000. Whether the Estimates had been worked up to more in one year than the other was another question. He could not think that every 12-inch gun cost £2,000 to prove it. He believed that, on this subject, the right hon. Gentleman had not correct information before him. As to the navy, the expense of armour-clads had been dealt with unfairly, for comparisons had been made with an exceptional year, which furnished no correct idea of the general expenditure. Had the years 1864 and 1865 been taken into account, and both dockyard and contract work compared, the result would have been very different. There were other questions connected with the expenditure for the navy which had been touched upon by his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty; but he should not advert to them on the present occasion, inasmuch as an opportunity for doing so would be offered when the Navy Estimates came on for discussion. There was no doubt of this, that the Estimates had been increased in two years by £2,750,000, and this was not a satisfactory state of things.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would inquire into the statement with regard to the testing of guns, which he confessed had a startling appearance. If he had been favoured with longer notice he would have done so in time for this discussion.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I think, Sir, I may safely say no one has ever heard me complain of this House jealously watching any increase of public expenditure; on the contrary, I think discussions of this nature greatly strengthen the hands of the Treasury in controlling that expenditure. If anyone will turn to the votes I have given since I have been a Member of this House he will find they have always been given in favour of economy. But when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) came down to the House the other night, and charged the present Government with extravagance. I thought it my duty to call the attention of the Committee to certain considerations he had entirely omitted. I ventured to say that the right hon. Gentleman was responsible for the expenditure he referred to. That position I re-affirm, notwithstanding that the right hon. Gentleman has controverted it to-night. There is no question that a large increase of expenditure was proposed last year; and I say that the right hon. Gentleman was bound, if he knew of sound reasons for objecting to that increase, not only to have stated his objection, but to have taken the sense of the House upon the subject. The right hon. Gentleman has said that it was not proper at that time to divert the House from the graver subject under consideration; but that I contend is not a sufficient excuse, for the right hon. Gentleman was not only a Leader of a majority of the House, but had filled a very important office, which he had lately vacated. He was also surrounded by hon.

Gentlemen who were all as thoroughly informed as the Members of the existing Government on the question he raised, and was, therefore, competent to advise the House. But what happened? The right hon. Gentleman acceded to the proposed expenditure. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman was assured by his Friends, who had presided over the Department concerned, that the increased expenditure was necessary. I said the other night that it was questionable whether cutting down expenditure was always economy, and increasing expenditure always extravagance; it was a question whether the unwise parsimony of the right hon. Gentleman's own administration had not caused the increased expenditure of last year. I challenged the right hon. Gentleman as to the question of arming the troops; I challenged him on the question of providing a sufficient number of ships for the relief of our stations, but the right hon. Gentleman to-night only repeats his generalities, and altogether avoids taking up my challenge. He does not at all refer to those points in which I said an increased expenditure had been rendered necessary. The Committee will, therefore, readily agree with me that the right hon. Gentleman is a year behind time, and that he is not right in saying that the expenditure we recommended last year was not fully justified. The right hon. Gentleman intimated that since he left the Treasury there seemed to have been no controlling power there. That statement I entirely deny. I consider that it is the duty of the Treasury to resist any application for unnecessary wasteful expenditure, but to assent to any increase of expenditure which is demanded by the exigencies of the public service. The Government would be betraying its trust if it did not acquiesce in expenditure shown to be necessary. That is my view regarding control; and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that these increased Estimates have been subjected to the most rigorous examination, and that everything has been done to cut down expenditure to the lowest point consistent with the requirements of the public service. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of our expenditure entailing further charges in future years. I reply that the present Government is in a similar position as regards former Governments. What was the Vote which recently occupied the House, relating to Consular buildings in Japan and China. Was not that a legacy from Lord Palmerston's Government? The policy of that Government was to increase our trade with China and Japan, and that course necessitated the placing of agents in various places. We have been required to find residences for those agents, and the expenditure was made on the recommendation of an officer sent out by the late Government. Therefore we have been obliged to propose extraordinary expenditure on account of measures originating with our immediate predecessors in Office, though the right hon. Gentleman says we have no legacies left from the late Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: What I said was that the legacies left by the late Government tended to a progressive decrease in expenditure.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I will take a case. The late Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir George Grey) recommended an increase in the pay of the police. I apprehend the right hon. Gentleman was a party to that measure, and I do not find fault with it. In fact, the pay of almost everybody having been increased, it was found the police force could not be properly recruited without raising the pay. The right hon. Member for Morpeth (Sir George Grey) sent a circular to all the counties, and suggested an increase in the pay of the police. That suggestion has been very largely acted on, and as the Treasury contributes 25 per cent of the constabulary pay, the proposal has resulted in increased Imperial expenditure. Those who scrutinize the Estimates carefully will find that very little of the increased expenditure of the year arises from new schemes; but that it is almost wholly occasioned by the continuing of measures set on foot by the late Government. It must also be remembered that the House is continually passing measures for the improvement of the country, and requiring Government to take the superintendence of such improvements. In this way a large increase of expenditure has been rendered necessary within the last two or three years by measures which have received the general assent of the House. There has been legislation for increased education, and for sanitary improvements. We have to pay for our improved civilization, and for the greater comfort that is now enjoyed by all classes of the people. Hon. Members, therefore, who press these proposals forward must not complain if, when their wishes are complied with, the Executive Government comes forward with new demands upon the taxpayer. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) took credit to the late Government because its expenditure had been generally below the Estimate. Now the Secretary for War has alluded to the numbers of the men recruited for the army, and, although the right hon. Baronet did not apply it in that way, this one item accounts for almost the whole of the savings of the Estimate mentioned by my hon. Friend. The pay offered by the late Government was not sufficient to attract men to the standard, and the numbers required for the service could not, therefore, be obtained. As no pay was required for those who did not come to the standard, it was easy to declare a saving had been made, and that is the way, I think, in which nearly the whole of the vaunted saving has been made. What has been the result of the measure proposed by the late Secretary of State for War (General Peel)? An increase on the Estimates of about £500,000 on account of an increase of pay of 2d. per day to the soldier, and 1d. per day for re-enlistment. We have had, if I recollect rightly, 26,000 enlistments of ten years men. If we have increased the Estimates and added to the expenditure we have something to show for the money; and we must look not only to the amount of the expenditure to be provided for, but also to whether that expenditure is justified by the circumstances. If we show that the money has not been squandered or wasted, but has produced that which is necessary for the protection and for the safety of the country, then I think the House of Commons will not blame the Government simply because the expenditure has increased. At this hour, I shall not trespass further on the attention of hon. Members; but after the long debate which has been held I trust no difficulty will be felt in assenting to the Motion.

Resolution agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorized to raise any sum of money, not exceeding One Million pounds sterling, by an issue of Exchequer Bonds."

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH called attention to the fact that we were putting by £1,000,000 this year and every year successively to make up a sinking fund, at the same time that we were borrowing another

£1,000,000 to meet current expenditure. This system of cross accounts, which must be very intricate and costly, was due to the action of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, who, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, was always taxing his brain to discover some financial novelty, and whose latest act had been to tie the country hand and foot for twenty years to this scheme of a sinking fund, to create which it was necessary to impose taxes otherwise needless upon the country to the extent of £1,000,000 yearly.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after the words "authorized to," in order to insert the words "suspend so much of the payment of the Terminable Annuities created in 1660 till the year 1885 as may amount to the difference of the annual payment made on their account, and of the interest of the £24,000,000 Stock for which they were exchanged, that is to say, a sum of £1,000,000,"

(Mr. Darby Griffith.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution."

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not adopt a proposal which would amount to a reversal of the policy agreed upon in 1866.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the hon. Member would not press his Amendment. The matter had been very fully discussed in 1866, and again last year; and the House, he thought, would exhibit great infirmity of purpose if, because of a temporary pressure, it abandoned a course of action which had been deliberately agreed upon. The Amendment, if carried, would necessitate the passing of a new Act to regulate the interest payable on the terminable annuities.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(3.) Resolved, That the principal of all Exchequer Bonds which may be so issued shall be paid off at par at any period not exceeding twelve months from the date of such Bonds.

(4.) Resolved, That the interest of such Exchequer Bonds shall be payable half-yearly, and shall be charged upon and issued out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, or the growing produce thereof.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again upon Wednesday.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL.

Bill for the amendment of the Law for the relief of the Poor in Ireland by substituting an Union Rating for the present system of rating by Electoral Divisions, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Serjeant BARR and Major GAVIS.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 108.]

House adjourned at half after Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, May 5, 1866.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Marriage Law (Ireland) Amendment* (89).

Second Reading—Friendly Societies (43).

Report—Medical Practitioners (Colonies)* (78).

Third Reading—Marriages (Frampton Mansel)*
(85), and passed.

NEW PEERS INTRODUCED.

The Right Honourable Sir John Trollope, Baronet, having been created Baron Kesteven of Casewick in the County of Lincoln—Was (in the usual Manner) introduced.

Sir Brook William Bridges, Baronet, having been created Baron Fitzwalter of Woodham Walter in the County of Essex—Was (in the usual Manner) introduced.

THE FRIENDLY SOCIETIES BILL.

(The Earl of Lichfield)

(NO. 43.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read

THE EARL OF LICHFIELD, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that great misunderstanding appeared to have prevailed respecting the 3rd clause of the Bill, petitions having been presented against it from many societies, one of them having 500,000 or 600,000 members, and another upwards of 100,000 members. It appeared to him from a careful perusal of these petitions that the object of the clause had been purposely misrepresented. The evils arising under a system which it has been proposed to abolish, which it is now proposed to introduce, their fallaciousness, their fallaciousness, those in any way the 9th Societies by which members the power children sum and the funeral and the become to say with this on that the same saying the templar the Friendly objects was the which was of members in the belonged intended members from their experience that more society that such the collection due to the transferrable found while his often found not having next point the force frequently in a large of script one fair that claims on that force were not Bill next certain a dispute 1 societies. dress in very great; but it was vastly increased in the case of burial societies. The members were often scattered over the whole country, and the redress provided by the rules was arbitration in the place where the society's business was carried on; and where a society had branches in almost every town it was often necessary to go to headquarters in order to obtain redress. The Bill proposed that redress should be had by members proceeding against the collector or agent in the place where the members lived. There was a clause which prevented a society enrolled or registered under the Friendly Societies Acts from being incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862. At present members frequently found that, without their consent, the Friendly Society to which they belonged had become a company, and they thereby lost all the privileges to which they would be entitled under the Friendly Society. He would now call their Lordships' attention to the petitions which had been presented against the Bill. Their Lordships were aware that there were in this country numerous Friendly Societies, admirably conducted, and doing most useful work among the labouring classes. The Odd Fellows and the Foresters numbered respectively 400,000 and 200,000 members. He desired to call their attention to the manner in which the petitions which had been presented against the Bill had been got up. A circular had been issued by the President of the Liver Society, which described the Bill as an attempt to curtail, crush, and destroy Friendly Societies and working men's clubs, and to place them entirely under the control of a paternal Government. Another circular had been sent out by the secretary of a different society, urging its collectors and agents to get up petitions signed by all persons above fourteen years of age, on the allegation that the Government were attempting to set up a system of assurance themselves, and to rob the poor by taking from them the management of their own affairs. In this case the petitions came from societies in which it could not be said that the members had any voice in the management; they were managed by committees composed only of collectors and agents in the different places where the members resided. Three societies which had presented a large number of petitions against the Bill were the Royal Liver, the Victoria Legal, and the United Legal. It appeared from official Returns printed for the House that, in a considerable number of cases, the expenditure of Friendly Societies amounted to considerably more than the income; but in that list the Liver Society and the Victoria Legal did not appear. However, from inquiries which he made, he found that the income of the Liver was £140,000 a year, the management expenses £53,000, and the funds in hand £117,000. That Society, which was established in 1850, had more than 600,000 members. He would call their Lordships' attention to the fact that the funds in hand were considerably less than one year's income; and all actuaries concurred in stating that any society which had been in existence only half the time of the Society he had just named, and had not a reserved fund of more than one year's income, must inevitably be insolvent. With regard to the Victoria Legal Society, he found that many returns called for with respect to that Society had not been filled up; but, according to the last annual report of the Society, it appeared that the last year's income was £28,431. The expenses and sums paid for burials were placed in one lump sum at £24,140. Thinking that there was something extraordinary in the manner in which the accounts were made out, he referred them to two persons of great experience, who confirmed his conviction that the accounts were clearly inaccurate; and an actuary of great experience had since stated, as the result of his experience, that there was an inaccurate statement in respect to no less a sum than £1,400. The funds in hand belonging to that Society amounted at the present moment to exactly half a year's income. That Society was established in 1843. The other Society petitioning against the Bill had among its honorary representatives a Member of their Lordships' House, who concurred with him in thinking that the expenditure of the Society was extravagant. These three Societies not only petitioned against the Bill, but prayed to be heard against it—a proceeding which simply meant that statements might be made by the various collectors employed by the Societies as to what they considered the importance of the business carried on by the Societies. One of the clauses of the Bill, bearing on all societies alike, was to the effect that in all cases where a person was admitted a member a policy should be given to him, and also a copy of the rules. He found that this clause also had been petitioned against; but he had mentioned the matter to a deputation which he had received from the Odd Fellows' Society, and he found that there could be no practical difficulty in giving such policies. He thought that their Lordships would see that it was the right of members of these societies to have something to show what their claim really was upon the society. He knew that it frequently happened that persons who had interested themselves for complaining members found that these persons had nothing to prove what their claim upon the society was, or to show what proceedings should be taken. The next point provided for by the Bill was that the Annual Report, or General Statement of the Funds and Effects required to be made to the Registrar under the Friendly Societies Act of 1855, should be made before March, instead of before June, in order that more time might be allowed for taking proceedings, in the event of any proceedings appearing necessary in consequence of irregularities in the accounts. The Bill also required a detailed statement of accounts to be made, specifying the sources from which the income was derived. The Bill also provided for an audit of accounts. He was perfectly well aware that great difficulty attached to any action taken with the object of providing for the auditing of the accounts of these societies; and he did not for a moment mean to contend that the Government should take upon itself so great a responsibility as the duty of seeing that their rules were sufficient, and ascertaining from time to time that they were solvent would involve. He was, however, of opinion that the mere publicity which would be given to the state of their affairs by means of the audit provided for by the clause, under the authority of a County Court Judge, would have the best possible effect in the way of warning persons not to join a society which was shown to be in an unsatisfactory position. He came in the next place to two clauses, the 9th and 10th, which related to affiliated societies, such as the Odd Fellows and the Foresters. The 9th clause had been framed expressly for the purpose of facilitating the operations of those societies, by saving them the trouble and inconvenience which were the consequence of their being obliged to have the rules of their different branches and lodges throughout the country separately certified; but, as he understood there was some objection to the clause on the part of these affiliated societies, he should offer no opposition to its being withdrawn. The 10th clause, he might amount

he had and lodg-great w lodges affiliated the rules
body m longer still res amount
bers un rules.
the ever the male which by Judge m terest w be hands society f of that that all consider ject of among t
of which now ask
Bill the assented
to him to Committe repeal v that he portance were app
the clause the gene
in all i nagnitude
terests o try, ough investigate useless f
do that i wide qu into onl having p into all t order to informat' vaio in pa

Moved
—(The )

THE I had bee their Lon emanatio
which th

which he was prevented by the forms of the House from presenting at that stage. It was not for him, without an investigation, to contradict the noble Earl's statements in regard to those societies. No doubt the charges for agency and management of Friendly Societies were often heavy; but, on the other hand, it was stated by the parties, that, when they came to carry on transactions of a very minute character, receiving pence from persons who were scattered over a wide area, a very considerable percentage must be expended on collection. But the point to which he wished chiefly to call the noble Earl's attention was this—the noble Earl told them that the whole question of Friendly Societies required a fuller investigation than it could have before a Select Committee of that House, and that he hoped a Royal Commission, for which he intended to move next year, would be appointed to inquire into the whole subject. There were, he understood, ten Acts of Parliament already in existence on that subject; and he should therefore like to know on what ground the noble Earl now proposed to add an eleventh Act to them before the investigation which he desired had taken place into the whole question.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he thought that very great credit was due to the noble Earl (the Earl of Lichfield) for the interest and trouble he had taken on a subject of vital consequence, he might almost say, to millions of persons in this country. No one was more anxious than he (the Earl of Malmesbury) was to see so important a question placed on a footing satisfactory to the Legislature and the classes who generally constituted the societies. Yet he could not help being struck, like his noble Friend who had last spoken, by an apparent contradiction in the statement of the Mover, who had said that a vast amount of information was still required on that subject, and that that information could be obtained only by means of a Royal Commission. Now, that seemed to be a good reason for postponing, until after a Royal Commission had reported, legislation on a subject, relating to which, as he was informed, there were not ten or eleven, but twenty-four Acts on the Statute Book. He would, therefore, suggest that the noble Earl, for the very reason he himself had given, that having made a very able and ample statement to the House, and thereby brought the subject before the public, he should wait till another year, hoping that a Commission might be appointed to investigate the whole question; after which he might proceed if he thought fit—and nobody would be more able to do so—to bring the matter to a satisfactory issue.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday the 19th instant.

ENDOWED GRAMMAR SCHOOLS.

QUESTION.

LORD TAUNTON asked the Lord President, Whether it is his intention to introduce a Bill to provide that offices given in Grammar Schools shall be subject to such regulations in future as Parliament may lay down? It was not his intention to enter into the merits of the Report on Middle Class Education; but he thought it was impossible for anyone to have read the part of that Report which related to the present state of the endowed grammar schools of this country, which were about 800 in number, without seeing that the time had fully come when, if Parliament intended to do its duty by the education of this country, it ought to insist upon putting those schools on a very different footing from that on which they now stood. There could be no security for the good management of these institutions unless power was placed in the hands of the trustees and visitors to dismiss the masters, unless they showed themselves competent to attract scholars and to conduct the schools in a satisfactory manner; and it was also highly necessary that any appointments that might be made to the masterships of grammar schools should be subject to the future action of Parliament. Many of these masters received salaries of £300 and £400 a-year, with a house, and they were bound to receive the pupils that presented themselves. He was far from bringing any charge against the whole body of masters, but many of them had very few pupils, and some were without a single pupil, and pursued a course which was calculated to deter pupils from coming to their schools. One of the Assistant Commissioners reported that he found a case in which the master of an endowed school had but a single pupil, whose education was by no means what might have been expected. When the Assistant Commissioner hinted to this master that he must have mistaken his vocation, and that it was desirable he should retire, he replied, "I do not want pupils. I have £300 a-year, and I will not retire unless on my full salary." And it was doubtful whether anyone could turn him out. The circumstances of the Session were not such as to induce the Government to bring in measures which were likely to be much controverted; but it was important that such a measure should be passed during the present Session, and a Bill of a single clause would be sufficient.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that great weight and importance should be attached to the observations of the noble Lord, who was Chairman of the Commission on Endowed Grammar Schools. These masters enjoyed a kind of freehold position, and the difficulty of legislation to meet the cases referred to by the noble Lord was increased by the necessity of compensating the masters whose retirement might be thought desirable. He quite concurred in the opinion that no new interests should be created pending legislation on this subject, and he had been in communication with his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary with a view to the introduction of a Bill to limit the interests of those who might be appointed to offices in endowed grammar schools, so that Parliament might be left free to deal with the matter in the next Session. A measure would be prepared at once, and it would be his duty to lay it upon their Lordships' table as soon as possible.

LORD TAUNTON suggested that the Bill might also be applicable to the appointment of new trustees.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that this matter would be considered by the legal gentleman entrusted with the preparation of the Bill.

MARRIAGE LAW (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

A Bill for amending the Laws respecting the Solemnization of Marriages in Ireland—Was presented by The Marquess of CLANRICARDE; read 1st. (No. 89.)

House adjourned at a quarter before
Seven o'clock to Thursday next,
half-past Ten o'clock.

Lord Taunton

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, May 5, 1868.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Municipal Corporations (Metropolis); Corporation of London *; Stockbrokers (Ireland).*

IRELAND—CATTLE PLAGUE. QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will lay before the House the detail of the expenditure of the sum levied over Ireland to meet preliminary expenses in anticipation of the cattle plague?

THE EARL OF MAYO said, in reply, that the accounts were nearly completed, and the details would be laid on the Table as soon as possible. A small sum remained in hand which had not been expended.

IRELAND—DEATHS FROM SMALLPOX. QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he would now beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether he is about to give instructions to the Constabulary in the case of deaths from smallpox, caused by inoculation, to endeavour to procure an inquest to be held, in order, if possible, to obtain a conviction for manslaughter, or for an offence against the Vaccination Act?

THE EARL OF MAYO, in reply, said, instructions had been given to the Constabulary in cases where deaths occurred under the circumstances referred to by the hon. Member for Galway to cause an inquest to be held. Those instructions, however were confined to certain localities, with regard to which information had been received. But if it were desired that the instructions should be made general, he had no objection whatever to that course.

IRELAND—HABEAS CORPUS ACT. QUESTION.

MR. BAGWELL said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether, considering the present tranquil state of Ireland, he conceives it necessary to keep prisoners arrested under the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act any longer in confinement; and, whether he will state to the House the number at present under confinement under the above Act?

THE EARL OF MAYO : Sir, when I moved for leave to introduce a Bill for the further extension of the Habeas Corpus Act there were ninety-six persons in confinement in Ireland under the Lord Lieutenant's warrant. I am happy to be able to state that this morning there were only twenty-three persons in confinement under the provisions of that Act, and, of those twenty-three, orders for the release of fourteen have already been made, on condition either that they leave the country or give solvent bail. As the House will see, there is reason to hope that before long any practical consequences of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland will have ceased.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACT, 1867—COMPOUND-HOUSEHOLDERS.
QUESTION.

MR. SCHREIBER said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to his Answer of the 18th of February upon the same subject, When he will state what recommendations he is prepared to make for the enfranchisement of "compound-householders in parishes not within existing borough boundaries, but which might be wholly or in part added to boroughs," and of whom the Boundary Commissioners report that "they will be precluded from qualifying as voters in the year 1869, unless some special provision is made for their protection?" He had understood the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion to admit the importance of this question, and to state that it had not escaped the attention of the Government; but, finding no reference to the matter in the Boundary Bill as laid upon the table, he felt it right to ask this question. ["Order!"]

MR. DISRAELI : Sir, the observations of the hon. Gentleman are quite justified. It was considered expedient that the remedy required should not be included in the Boundary Bill as laid upon the table; but that, when the Measure had gone through Committee, I should, if necessary, propose a clause upon the subject. Of course, it is quite possible that the matter may have previously received the attention of the Committee upon the Bill.

SCHOOL AND TRAINING SHIPS.
QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, with reference to the sale of such of Her Majesty's ships as are not now required for the Service, Whether the use of such ships might be obtained for Schools or other public purposes, subject to such conditions for their preservation, and their return when required, as the Admiralty may prescribe?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, in reply, that the Admiralty had already in many instances given ships for the purposes specified by the hon. Gentleman, and would be glad to do so where this was possible and compatible with the public service. At the same time he must point out that, in many cases, the societies not only asked for the loan of ships, but required that these should be refitted, caulked, and otherwise repaired at very large cost, for which no provision could be made in the Naval Estimates.

DEBATES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS.
QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask Mr. Speaker, Whether the direct allusions made that evening by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) to what had taken place in the House of Lords was in order?

MR. SPEAKER : The rule of the House is, that allusion to debates in the other House of Parliament should not be made in this. It would have been competent to the hon. Member to have risen to order, if he had thought fit this evening; but it is scarcely possible that, under all circumstances, the rule can be construed in an absolutely literal manner. When declarations have been made by Ministers of the Crown, particularly as affecting the position of this House, exceptions have been made to the strict observance of this particular rule.

BOUNDARY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. HIBBERT said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, When the Boundaries Bill would be brought on?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, in reply, that he had expected to proceed with the Boundary Bill on Thursday; but, as that day had been given up to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire for his remaining Resolutions, he feared he should not be able to do so. He would, however, proceed with it on the earliest possible day.

ARMY—RESERVE FORCES.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether any regulations for the Army Reserve or Militia Reserve Forces have been made under the "Army Reserve Act, 1867," and the "Militia Reserve Act, 1867;" whether any instructions with reference to the latter force have been issued to Commanding Officers of Militia Regiments now called out for training; and, whether he will lay such regulations and instructions upon the Table of the House?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that regulations had been made under both Acts. Those regulations would be issued immediately, and laid on the table of the House.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT—DEFEAT OF THE GOVERNMENT ON THE IRISH CHURCH RESOLUTIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Sir, to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of Her Majesty's Government which will require some explanation; and I will therefore commence by moving the adjournment of the House. I think the justification of that course will appear from the matter which I have to state. I did not expect, when I closed the remarks which I had to make to the House yesterday afternoon, on the subject of the Ministerial Explanations, that it would be my duty to revert to that matter at so early a date. But the character of the debate which took place in this House was unexpectedly altered by a remarkable declaration, withheld from us by the Prime Minister during the lengthened speech which he addressed to us at the commencement of the Sitting, and given in so enigmatical a manner and at such a period that neither my hon. Friends who sit about me, nor I myself, were in a condition to follow him or to comment upon that speech. But even that declaration, enigmatical as it was, does not constitute the whole, or even the main part, of the subject which I wish to bring under the notice of the Government and the House, and with respect to which I am about to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. I must remind the House briefly of what occurred with regard to an essential portion of the right hon. Gentleman's communication. The right hon. Gentleman told us at the commencement of the Sitting that the advice Ministers had tendered to the Crown was to dissolve the present Parliament; but that if, for any reason, Her Majesty saw cause to prefer a different course, and to ask the advice of other persons, Her Majesty's Government would place their resignation in Her Majesty's hands. Her Majesty, said the right hon. Gentleman, did not accept their resignation, and she was ready—I am quoting now what I believe to have been his words, but up to this time I have only given the substance of them—"she was ready to dissolve this Parliament as soon as the state of Public Business would permit." I myself, Sir—and, I believe, the whole House—distinctly understood the meaning of those words; and I testified, and others did so too in the remarks which they offered, that, according to our view, the advice offered as to an immediate dissolution had not been taken, that the resignation of the Government had not been accepted, and that the condition in which we stood was this—the Government proposed to carry on the Public Business until after the completion of those portions of business which they had declared to be essential—namely, business having relation to the subject of Reform—when they should be in a condition to advise Her Majesty to dissolve the present Parliament. The reference to such a dissolution was undoubtedly not open to objection; although, on other grounds, it was my duty to take exception to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, and other Members took exception to it likewise with great justice upon other points. One of them, in particular, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), rightly charged that the right hon. Gentleman, by the mode of his communication to the House, for the first time, I believe, in recent history, certainly within the recollection of the present generation, or, as far as I know, within any other recollection,—seemed to make Her Majesty the suggester of the course which was about to be pursued by the Government, instead of the acceptor or rejector of the simple and single advice tendered by them to her, as has been the case on every former occasion. However, feeling the absorbing interest and importance of a great public question, I think I may say for some, if not all of us, who sit on this side of the House, that we were desirous to pass by topics purely political, and in that strain the debate was closed. But, at the close of the debate, the right hon. Gentleman gave us, in that enigmatic manner which is so peculiar to him, a most important addition, which was likewise, in fact, an alteration of the speech which he had made, because he signified that Her Majesty had given an unqualified assent to a dissolution of Parliament, without reference to the new or to the old constituency. Had I had the power of following the right hon. Gentleman, I should have asked for an explanation of that statement. I own it excited my suspicion; I thought that it meant more than the words were intended at the moment to convey, and that it was a sort of cover for future and ulterior designs. But I wish now to illustrate that which occurred at the close of our debate, when none of us who had entered into it were in a condition to comment on the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and when the House, at the approach of the inevitable hour of dinner, had sunk to low water mark. The illustration which it appears to have received from a statement made elsewhere is really most significant. It signifies not to me in what other place this statement was made. I am not going to run across either the letter or the spirit of any of our rules—I speak of statements credibly reported to have been made, it matters not in what place, by responsible Advisers of the Crown; and it is upon this statement that I wish to put a distinct question to Her Majesty's Government—a question which, I trust, will lead, either upon this or upon some other occasion, if it should be requisite, to an answer equally clear and distinct. It appears that one Member of the Cabinet (the Earl of Malmesbury) made a declaration elsewhere which was in precise concurrence and agreement, so far as I am able to learn or to comprehend it, with the first edition of the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. After that had been done, exception was taken to that statement upon grounds essentially similar to part of the objections taken in this House, and a question appears likewise to have been put asking for further information from the Government. In answer to that question the Duke of Richmond is reported to have spoken, and to have touched upon one or two points to which in my remarks I have referred. In the early part of what fell from him, he is reported to have said—

"I can only recapitulate imperfectly what my noble Friend (the Earl of Malmesbury) stated so clearly as to the position of affairs at this moment. The Prime Minister, on the part of his Colleagues, tendered to his Sovereign the resignation of their Offices on Friday afternoon. Her Majesty took time to consider the matter, and received the Prime Minister again in audience upon Saturday." —[3 Hansard, cxc. 1890.]

Now, Sir, I submit to the House that is a statement totally different from the one made by the right hon. Gentleman. ["No, no!"] That is a statement that the Prime Minister went down to Osborne and tendered the resignation of the Government to the Queen. I do not now inquire how it was, and why it was, the Duke of Richmond gave that form to his statement—I have no doubt in perfect integrity—because that is a matter which may call for further comment. ["Oh, oh!"] No doubt, it is the wish of the hon. Gentlemen who interrupt me that no such comment should be made; but the duties incumbent on Members of this House are not to be discharged otherwise than in accordance with our deliberate convictions and sense of what is right. Sir, as to the statement made, what I want to point out is this, if I have not made myself clear:—The right hon. Gentleman said he went down to Osborne and advised a dissolution, but if Her Majesty should see fit not to accept that advice he tendered his resignation. The statement of the Duke of Richmond yesterday was that the right hon. Gentleman tendered his resignation on Friday. The noble Duke did not say a word about the right hon. Gentleman having advised a dissolution. That is the first discrepancy I wish to notice, and respecting which I wish for information. I want to know whether this statement is accurate and correct. But I pass on to a matter equally unintelligible, and I think more weighty and more important—in truth a matter calling for the gravest attention of this House—I will not say now, because that may depend on the Answers which may be given, but probably hereafter. The remainder of the statement is as follows:—After the noble Duke announced that Her Majesty had declined the resignation, and that the Government would continue to conduct the public affairs as long as they were able to do so, he is reported to have gone on and spoken as follows:—

"And in the event of any difficulties arising, Her Majesty was graciously pleased to state that she would make no objection to a dissolution of Parliament."—[Ibid.]

The noble Duke then appears to have proceeded to reiterate that important statement. I may say I have endeavoured as well as I was able to ascertain whether the report of the noble Duke's observations is correct. With that object I have applied to one very competent witness, and the evidence I have received is that it is correct. Well, then the noble Duke is reported to have made these further observations—

"It of course will depend upon the state of affairs whether that dissolution shall be a dissolution under the existing constituency, or whether it shall be a dissolution under the new constituency to be formed under the Reform Acts; but Her Majesty was graciously pleased to state that she would make no objection to either course being adopted by her Advisers whenever they should see fit to tender to Her Majesty a recommendation on that subject."—[3 Hansard, cxc. 1690]

[Cheers.] Now, Sir, in the first place, I hear cheers which I think it material to note from the opposite side, as I presume they are an indication of the opinion of the hon. Gentlemen who utter them that the sentiments expressed by the noble Duke are right and constitutional sentiments. I am not about to ask the right hon. Gentleman, or the Government, whether Her Majesty did say she would make no objection to a dissolution, or to any other course being adopted by her Advisers when they should think fit. Sir, a long experience of over thirty years has satisfied this House and the country that Her Majesty well deserves—if ever any Sovereign deserved—this simple testimony, that she knows and that she has ever walked in the lines and pathways of the Constitution. It is not for one moment to be supposed that there is the slightest question to be raised on that subject. I gladly echo back the just statement of the right hon. Gentleman that to the advantage of having acquired a thorough knowledge of the principles of the Constitution Her Majesty possesses, in addition, the inestimable advantage of what he pointedly, and not unjustly, described as "a vast experience of public affairs." Sir, my question is not as to what has taken place, or to what has not taken place, between the Sovereign and her Ministers; it is simply as to the words purporting to have been spoken by these Ministers themselves. These are words respecting which I wish to know whether they are avowed or disavowed by the right hon. Gentleman for the whole Government. We have heard enough, indeed, of differences in the speeches of Members of the Cabinet. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs and Gentlemen latter right of the Fi need not the dison

Foreign B on the In language described undertake made by t
—that he purpose o
ment, and when he s poss. Be
It is one Ministers define the the Govern mons. In Member o Parliamen
and to the ment such bound, to they adopt
As to the
I need sa enough.
that leave tained by anticipatio cases whi
ence to th not simpl
enough—respect of of every a before the this leave dissolve t difficulties of its vot Majesty's meaning frain at t further.

—I think this lang adopted what may it is perfe
late; my
I know th
distractio hardly pro man has exact exp

Mr. Gladstone

It would be most unjust on my part to press for an answer to an inquiry which, so far as the right hon. Gentleman is concerned, may be a hypothetical inquiry. I have no objection, therefore, to his taking time to ascertain the facts; but I ask for a distinct and intelligible answer to these Questions: First, whether language of this kind was used by the Duke of Richmond, now one of the confidential Advisers of the Crown; secondly, if it was so used, whether it is adopted by Her Majesty's Government as signifying the relations in which they stand to the House of Commons, and the position in which they would ask the House of Commons to continue to discharge its functions in the execution of the legislative business of the country?

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. DISRAELI: I would first observe that I had myself yesterday no wish whatever to again address the House; but pointed inquiries were made to me on particular heads, and it was necessary therefore that I should reply to them; and I had an opportunity of replying to them subsequently to my original statement, an hon. Gentleman having moved the adjournment of the House. That would have given the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone)—although he had spoken previously—an opportunity of speaking again. Therefore the remark of the right hon. Gentleman that he was silent and reticent then because the forms of the House would not allow of his noticing my observations really has no foundation. It was perfectly open to the right hon. Gentleman to make any comments whatever on any discrepancy which he may have thought he observed in my statements as to the audiences graciously accorded to me by Her Majesty. But the right hon. Gentleman was silent. I do not think that on subjects of this kind there ought to be any difference of opinion between the two sides of the House. It is for the interest and the honour of both sides of the House that on a matter of such grave import there should be no misunderstanding. We may all use expressions which are liable to misinterpretation; but I do unequivocally maintain that there was not the slightest difference—certainly not the slightest intentional difference—between my original and my subsequent statement as to what occurred at the audience which Her Majesty graciously accorded to me. That there was a misunderstanding, however, on the part of the right hon. Gentleman and of other hon. Gentlemen as to one point was very obvious to me as the discussion went on, and accordingly at the right time I took the opportunity of correcting that misunderstanding. I will again repeat very succinctly, but very accurately, what occurred when, by Her Majesty's gracious permission, I attended Her Majesty at Osborne. After putting Her Majesty in possession of the views entertained by the Government of their position, I did at once, considering the present state of affairs, recommend a dissolution of Parliament, not only in justice to Her Majesty's Government, but for the sake of obtaining the decision of the country on the great question at stake. I understand that this is the statement I made last night, and I repeat that statement. I did also, when in audience of Her Majesty, add, in reference to the first and inferior motive of that advice—namely, the personal claims of the Ministers—that if Her Majesty thought a more satisfactory settlement of the question at issue could be attained, or that the best interests of the country would be better considered by our immediately retiring from Her Majesty's service, we should retire only with that feeling of gratitude to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred. The advice then which I gave, with the full consent of my Colleagues, was, to advise Her Majesty to an immediate dissolution—to a dissolution of Parliament "as soon as"—according to custom and the constitutional phrase—"as soon as the state of Public Business would permit." That was the statement which I made, or certainly intended to make, to the House, and I believe that is generally recognized as the statement which I made.

MR. BRIGHT: As I do not wish the right hon. Gentleman to rise in order to explain again, I wish to ask him whether the recommendation made to Her Majesty referred to a dissolution with the present constituency?

MR. DISRAELI: What I complain of, and what has led to misapprehension, is that when a person in my position comes here and makes what he intends to be a clear and plain statement of what occurred, hon. Gentlemen rise up and interpose matters which really have nothing to do with the question—["Oh, oh!"]—nothing to do with what I am stating. I have stated what occurred in that audience; but when I have made what I think was a very clear statement on that subject the hon. Gentleman gets up and says, "But did you refer to something else?" I repeat my statement as I made it. We recommended absolutely and unequivocally, without reference to any particular circumstances, that Her Majesty should dissolve Parliament for a particular reason, as soon as the state of Public Business would permit. And Her Majesty, without reference to any point such as the hon. Gentleman mentions, ultimately sanctioned that advice, refusing to accept our resignations, and expressing her readiness to dissolve Parliament as soon as the Public Business would permit. That was the statement which I made last night. I afterwards, having Her Majesty's permission to speak frankly to the House, and wishing, as indeed, it was my duty, to conceal nothing, but simply to discharge my duty to the House, made a statement in reference to the meaning which the House might wish to ascribe to the phrase "when the state of Public Business will permit." And I need not remind the House that I was in a position in which no Minister was ever placed before, because the circumstances which now exist never existed before. Therefore it was my duty to lay those circumstances before Her Majesty; but this had nothing to do with the original advice given, or with the original decision of Her Majesty. I had to state facts which are perfectly familiar to every Gentleman in this House—that there is an existing constituency and a newer constituency—which matters Her Majesty must have been well acquainted with, although I nevertheless felt I ought to bring them directly under Her Majesty's notice. I did hope that if we gave up all the Bills which we had introduced into the House, and confined our attention merely to the supplementary measures connected with the Reform Act, the House would act cordially with the Ministry, so that we might be able to bring affairs to so expeditious a conclusion that the General Election might be taken by an appeal to the new constituency. That is what I conveyed to the House yesterday—that was the observation which I felt it my duty to make to Her Majesty, and I could not have appeared in this House upon the subject without frankly communicating the fact in the same spirit to the House. But that has nothing whatever to do with the original object of my visit to Osborne. I did at once, in consequence of the state of affairs, and in consequence of the position in which we were placed, recommend a dissolution of Parliament; and, as I have already stated to the House, I did, on behalf of myself and my Colleagues, tender our resignations. Her Majesty refused to accept our resignations, and sanctioned a dissolution of Parliament as soon as the state of Public Business should permit. I am sorry to have been under the necessity of going at any length into this subject on the present occasion; but after the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, it was absolutely necessary that I should put the matter clearly before the House. And now, Sir, I think that, having been the Minister who was in audience of the Queen, my statement on this subject may be taken as the authentic statement; and if a statement is made in "another place" by a Minister who is my Colleague, and which may be different from the statement I have made here—and I must candidly say I was entirely unaware, until the right hon. Gentleman told the House this evening, that any remarks of the kind had been made, for I have had no opportunity of making myself acquainted with them—but if any of my Colleagues in "another place" have conveyed a different impression to the House in which they sit, it appears to me that—I having been the Minister who was in audience of the Sovereign, and who came down here to make an authentic statement by Her Majesty's command and permission—the logical consequence would be that my Colleague in "another place" should be called upon to explain the differences between the statement alleged by the right hon. Gentleman to have been made there and the statement made by the Chief Minister, who has been in audience of the Queen, and who, by Her Majesty's command and permission, came down to the House of Commons to tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. BOUVERIE: If a Member of this House wished to ascertain what had been stated by a Member of the Government in "another place," the proper course to take would be to ask a question of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. My right hon. Friend does not sit in the other House, and consequently has no opportunity of questioning the Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman. He has, however, a legitimate and proper opportunity of questioning the right hon. Gentleman here, and why the right hon. Gentleman has complained of my right hon. Friend's giving him an opportunity of giving an explanation in this House I, for one, am at a loss to understand. I admit there may be a defect of understanding on my part; but still I think there is an ambiguity in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, who has not told us whether the dissolution which he recommended to Her Majesty, and which her Majesty sanctioned, will be with the present or the future constituency. Now, the Duke of Richmond, as I understand, stated in "another place"—and the accuracy of the report is not disputed—that the power of dissolution was in the alternative, and the important business still before this House is to be conducted under the impression, at any rate in this House, that if the Ministry are defeated a second, or rather a fourth, time, then, at last a dissolution is to come. Those who have been at a public school know what "a first fault" is; but it appears that, according to this new constitutional doctrine, the right hon. Gentleman, according to the explanation of the Duke of Richmond, has gone a step further than he enunciated yesterday, and now the doctrine seems to be that, if the Government suffer a tremendous defeat once, or twice, or three times, it shall count for nothing; but that, if they are defeated again, there shall certainly be a dissolution and an appeal to the existing constituency. Now, that seems far worse than anything which has been yet proposed. On this point let me appeal to the good sense of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, who has a considerable knowledge of constitutional practice. How is it possible for the deliberations of this House to be fairly conducted, or for the relations between the House and the Crown and its Ministers to be properly maintained, if this is to be the understanding? I think all this follows from the course which the right hon. Gentleman has pursued. I insist upon it that it is a sound doctrine that, under such circumstances as exist at present, Government ought either to resign or dissolve; and, in the latter event, they ought to state distinctly and clearly that they will only just conclude the business already in hand, appealing to the good sense of the House to assist them in doing so. Now, if you are determined, as the right hon. Gentleman intimated yesterday, to carry on this Parliament till the new constituency have had an opportunity of expressing their opinion, eight or nine months must certainly elapse—and possibly eighteen or nineteen months—before we can have a dissolution, because the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills now stand in the position which the English Reform Bill occupied last year; and, if we are to have long and elaborate discussions in Committee on the clauses of those Bills, it is not at all unlikely that, at the close of the discussions, some demand may be made that the register of the new voters in Scotland and Ireland should not come into operation till the succeeding year, so that a further lease of Office will be given to the Government. It comes to this—the House of Commons have distinctly expressed this want of confidence by an overpowering vote. [Cries of "Move!"] I say there has been a Vote of Want of Confidence of the House on the Irish ecclesiastical policy of the Government. I contend, and without dread of dispute, that this was not, as the right hon. Gentleman alleged yesterday, an unprovoked and unnecessary move on the part of the Opposition; but that it was provoked by the Government stating and inviting an opinion upon their Irish Church policy. Then, what was the meaning of the vote to which we came? It was that we had no confidence in the Irish ecclesiastical policy of Her Majesty's Government; that we did not approve the principle of levelling up rather than the principle of levelling down; that we had a distinct policy which was the exact contrary of that of the right hon. Gentleman, and that in this most material respect we had not the slightest confidence in the Government. That is equivalent to what has been admitted in the past practice and history of this House to be substantially a Vote of Want of Confidence. It is idle, after a Resolution of that kind has been carried by such a majority, to say—"It is true you may not like our Irish Church policy; you may not think it right to endow a new Roman Catholic College, nor to increase the Regium Donum; but look how unassailable are our foreign administration, our Indian government, and our financial management." That is no answer to the vote of this House that, in respect of their Irish Church policy, the Government does not possess our confidence.

MR. SANDFORD said, that the statement of the noble Duke in "another place" was perfectly plain, straightforward, and was expressed in language not so cautious and not so mystifying as that of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. The statement that the right hon.

Gentleman had just made was in perfect accordance with the narrative of the noble Duke; but he must confess that, after hearing the first statement of the right hon. Gentleman, he laboured under a very different impression of what had taken place than he did after hearing the explanations of this evening. What he understood this evening was that the right hon. Gentleman had advised a dissolution of this House, and Her Majesty had consented to it, and, further, that the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to press that dissolution, not upon any necessary measures for completing the Reform Bills, but only if, upon the introduction of any new matter or subject, a vote equal to a Vote of Want of Confidence were carried. If he understood the right hon. Gentleman—and it was a point that should be cleared up—the House was at perfect liberty to alter the Irish and Scotch Reform Bills and the Boundary Bill as it pleased. He hoped the House would not endorse that it should enter into legislation on these matters with the threat of dissolution hanging over its head. He could have understood the right hon. Gentleman stating that the Government were perfectly willing to complete the work of Reform and then to dissolve, that would be a fair and just proposition; but if the right hon. Gentleman meant to say he had the power in his pocket to dissolve the House if it altered the Scotch or Irish Reform Bills, or rejected the Boundary Bill, that was a most unconstitutional proceeding on the part of any Minister. The declaration of the noble Duke appeared to have been amply borne out by the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. CARDWELL: The right hon. Gentleman says that if anybody questions a statement that has been made, or supposed to have been made by one of his Colleagues, the logical course is to put a question to that Colleague himself. It appears to me that when we want to know whether the language of a Colleague of the right hon. Gentleman is the language of the collective Government, acknowledged, approved, and avowed by the right hon. Gentleman himself, and when we speak of transactions in which the right hon. Gentleman, and not his Colleague, took a part, whatever the logical course may be, the fair and straightforward course is to propound a question to the right hon. Gentleman himself, and if there is no mystery at the bottom of this matter there will be no difficulty in giving a simple answer to the question. It is our bounden duty to see whether there is any mystery, or whether there is plainness and straightforwardness on the part of the right hon. Gentleman and the Government. In the reply of the right hon. Gentleman last night he used these words—

Mr. Sandford

“ Her Majesty did not accept our resignations, and gave her unqualified assent to a dissolution of Parliament, without the least reference to old or new constituencies.”—[3 Hansard, cxc. 1742.]

Now, Sir, in those words, taken by themselves, there is not rising to the surface, perhaps, the appearance of a menace or threat; but these words do not stand by themselves; they are explained by other words which have been used by a person justified in speaking on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. He refers to the same transaction, and his words are these—

“ We intend to conduct the affairs of the country so long as we are able to do so; and in the event of any difficulties arising Her Majesty was graciously pleased to state she would make no objection to a dissolution of Parliament. It, of course, will depend upon the state of affairs whether that dissolution shall be a dissolution under the existing constituency or whether it shall be a dissolution under the new constituency to be formed under the Reform Acts.”—[3 Hansard, cxc. 1690.]

Now, Sir, we have a practical object in endeavouring to obtain an answer to this question. As long as I have been in Parliament, or have read anything even of the rudiments of the Constitution, I have believed there were two things which to violate was to violate the essential condition of freedom in this country: one was to give the Sovereign the appearance of expressing an opinion to Parliament, and the other was placing Parliament in reality or in appearance under the menace or threat of dissolution. Now, Sir, it appears to me upon the statement of the right hon. Gentleman—it is not yet clear, but we are giving the right hon. Gentleman a fair and straightforward opportunity of saying whether it be the case—firstly, that he tendered simple, unqualified, direct advice to his Sovereign, and not contingent or optional advice; and secondly, he is not now placing us under the menace or threat of a dissolution in regard to the future conduct of our business in this House. That was the object of the question propounded by my right hon. Friend. I humbly submit to the House it cannot be put off by clever phrases and ingenious evasions in debate; and that we are entitled to be told in what character we are about to legislate during the short remainder of the Session, and whether we are the free representatives of those who sent us here or we only hold our places at the will and pleasure of the right hon. Gentleman?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: My right hon. Friend the Member for the city of Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), has put an intelligible and very simple question, to which the Government are able to give a very intelligible and simple reply. But the question as it was originally put by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) was one which it was not perfectly easy to understand, and still less easy to answer. The question as it was put had reference to what had been said by my noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) in "another place." My right hon. Friend the First Minister had not read or seen the report of what the Duke of Richmond had said; and I may say for myself, that I also had not seen it; but a question has now been put by the right hon. Member for the City of Oxford to which the Government have not the smallest difficulty in giving an answer. The right hon. Gentleman asks, whether it is to be understood that the Government hold out to the House any menace of a dissolution. ["No, no!"] It will be in the recollection of the House whether that was not the question of the right hon. Gentleman. We were asked, unless I misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, this question, whether it was to be understood, in the account which my right hon. Friend had given of his interview with Her Majesty, and of Her Majesty's expressions of approval of the recommendation that had been made to her, that a menace was held out to this House by which the House was to be considered to proceed to wind-up the business which now lies before it under the threat of a dissolution. I say at once, on the part of the Government, there was no intention of that sort, and that no such menace was held out.

MR. AYRTON said, that, having listened attentively to the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government yesterday, he had failed to understand the exact situation of affairs, which, therefore, might not be so well understood by other hon. Members and throughout the country as it ought to be. He had been enlightened by the statement made in "another place," and he had listened to the further explanations that had now been made, and he was now more confused than he was before any explanation was given. He was inclined to to think this confusion arose from the fact that the Prime Minister had given the House, not a statement of what took place between himself and his Sovereign, but a short summary of his own idea of the communications which passed between them. ["Oh!"] He must repeat that assertion, and adhere to it, because the right hon. Gentleman did not profess to give an account of the communications between his Sovereign and himself; but he gave only the effect of it; and the communications could not have been of the brief nature he had described to the House. In attempting to give a short version of what must have taken place he might have done justice to himself; but it was not so clear he had done full justice to his Sovereign. A very painful impression would be created throughout the country, and more especially in Ireland, when the full nature of the right hon. Gentleman's statement of the result of his communication with his Sovereign was understood. For what was that result? Did the right hon. Gentleman tell his Sovereign that a great majority of the House of Commons had, after full discussion, deliberately resolved upon a policy with the object of satisfying the people of Ireland, and that it was necessary, in the opinion of the great majority of the House, that that policy should be immediately carried into effect? Did he tell his Sovereign that he was determined to resist that policy to the utmost, and would use all the power and influence of the Government for the purpose of setting at defiance the deliberate judgment of the House of Commons? Did he ask to be left in Office for that purpose; and was it for that purpose his Sovereign said he should not resign, but should continue to administer public affairs? The House must know something more of the circumstances under which the right hon. Gentleman said he tendered his resignation, which his Sovereign refused to accept? Did the right hon. Gentleman advise his Sovereign to accept his resignation? This practice of tendering a resignation was unintelligible unless it was accompanied by the most solemn advice to the Sovereign to accept it, and unless all the arguments were used which were necessary to induce the Sovereign to accept it. ["Oh, oh!"] If this were not done, how could a Minister of the Crown suggest that the Sovereign was keeping him in Office for the purpose of resisting the deliberate judgment of the House of Commons? It was absolutely necessary to explain the whole interview, and not the effect of it, when that effect was to give a character to a Ministry at the expense of the Sovereign. Then, in a further communication with the Sovereign, language was used of a most equivocal character. This was when a suggestion was made that Parliament should be dissolved "as soon as the state of Public Business would admit." In the ordinary sense of those words they meant that Parliament would be dissolved within a fortnight. If such language were addressed to any hon. Member conversant with public affairs, and he were told that Parliament was to be dissolved as soon as the state of Public Business would admit, he would at once understand that there would be a dissolution within a fortnight. Was that the sense in which this recommendation was made to Her Majesty, or had it some different meaning? If so, it was an ambiguous piece of advice, leading to no satisfactory result. They had not, as it appeared to him, had a fair and frank statement of what took place between the Sovereign and the First Minister, and he was prepared to repeat the assertion that the name of the Sovereign had been used towards the House in a manner wholly unjustifiable. What was the proposition that had been made to the House? The right hon. Gentleman asked the great majority of the House to come to this extraordinary bargain, that they should abdicate their functions during the residue of the Session, and refuse to proceed with the Public Business submitted for their consideration, and that for no purpose that he could conceive, save to keep the present Government in Office. He wanted to know whether, when such a proposition was made, the House did not feel itself outraged when it was asked to abdicate all its functions, forego all its privileges, and postpone all its business, for no other object than to gratify the ambition of the First Minister of the Crown?

MR. GRAVES: I would not have risen at the present moment if I were not actuated by a strong feeling, which I believe to be shared by many of the Independent Members of this House, and I hope that they will not hesitate to express their opinion upon the present aspect of affairs. If I have hitherto remained silent on the obstruction to the business of this House which is caused by these discussions, it is not because the questions which now occupy so much of our time might not have been as well dealt with at the close of the Session, when they would not have stood in the way of others, but because I felt that any appeal to either side of the House would be received as useless. But if I have hitherto remained quiescent in this state of things, that is no reason for my continuing to do so, and allow, without observation, the ordinary business of this House to be obstructed night after night as it has hitherto been. I, for one, enter my protest against this state of affairs. I do not wish to use harsh words. I would rather throw oil on the troubled waters. But I think it deserves consideration, whether it is right or just that questions, however grave and important in themselves, should be allowed to monopolize the whole of our time, especially when suddenly interposed? The half of the present Session is now run, and we have Estimates that are still to be approved by the House; we have the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills almost untouched; we have the Boundary Bill and the Bribery Bill to consider; we have the Education and the Bankruptcy measure to discuss. These might be small matters in comparison with the topics of factious party warfare; but they are matters of grave consideration for the country at large, and I urge them on the fair and candid consideration of the House at large, and not with a view to the interests of the one side or the other. We have these measures; and, what is more, we were told by the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland that he had a measure prepared for the settlement of the land question in Ireland, and I, who know something of that question, tell the right hon. Member for South Lancashire that if he had taken up the Irish land question he would have earned the lasting gratitude of Ireland, and not the lasting bitterness which will follow his attempt to overthrow a Church. These are the reasons which have induced me to bring the House back to the business that lies before it; and I appeal to Independent Members on both sides of the House to condemn this system of perpetual party warfare. I do not wish to impute motives, or I should allude to the semblance of wilful obstruction. The business of the House has come to a dead lock, and unless those Members who are above party feeling will step in and interfere in a bold and decided manner, the present state of things will be anything but creditable to us. Men come here from different motives: some for amusement, some for occupation, some for place. But there are also some who come here from a simple and earnest desire to do their duty, and to assist in carrying out the practical legislation of the country, and to do this they make great sacrifices. But I begin to think that such men are out of place in this House. My experience has certainly not been of great duration, but I speak of the experience of the last few Sessions, and especially so far as the experience of the present year. I know I need not appeal to the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, because he has committed himself to a course which, however unexpectedly introduced to this House—however some may regard it as an obstruction to practical business—still he pursues it with an impetuosity and an impulsiveness which would render any appeal to him a mere waste of time. But I do appeal to those Members who last year so boldly and manfully asserted the rights of private judgment, and who by their independence saved their party from disgrace. To them we owe it to a large extent that we have a Reform Bill—to them we owe it that that Bill was carried through this House—to them, who represent, like myself, large constituencies and important commercial interests—to them I make my appeal to stop these party contests that are going on night after night. They are the men who have great weight and importance in this House; and I ask them to assist in bringing the House back to that state in which it will be possible to transact the ordinary and necessary business of the country.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. OSBORNE: I freely grant that the hon. Member for Liverpool, who has just resumed his seat, is an apt type of the purity and placidity of this House. But when he says that he is about to pour oil upon this debate, I must say—and with his commercial knowledge he will recognize the article—that there is an oil called petroleum, which has anything but calming effects upon the surface on which it is poured. When the hon. Gentleman undertakes to lecture Members on this (the Opposition) side in good round words upon the position of affairs, and talks of the stop which has been put to private business, I think he might have taken larger views, and recollected that there are questions of such great public import that a Member, whether private or having held an official capacity, is quite warranted in coming forward and expressing his opinion upon them. I do not wish to lay any stress upon ducal declarations in “another place.” They are generally confused, and frequently ungrammatical. If I want an explanation of Ministerial policy I do not go to the subordinates of the Government, however distinguished by title; I come to the great man himself—to the Minister who sits in this House. Well, the right hon. Gentleman last night explained the course he pursued, and I am free to say that I am not disposed to quarrel with the decision to which Her Majesty's Ministers have come. And why? Because I think that a question so large in its import, so vast in its ultimate effects upon Imperial policy—I mean the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church—is a question which may be well referred to the enlarged public opinion of the new constituencies. I think so for another reason, which is that the present constitution of this House is so miserable, and many of its Members so weak and so vacillating, that the sooner they are got rid of and sent about their business the better for the country. But, Sir, while I agree with the decision to which Her Majesty's Government have come, I must say I condemn the means by which that decision has been arrived at. Why, Sir, what have we heard to-night? We have heard the personal claims of Ministers urged as a reason for the forbearance of the House; and, curiously enough, those personal claims have been put before the peace of this country. What else have we heard? For the first time at least in this century the authority of the Crown has been made use of almost as sympathizing with the difficulties of the Administration. Nay, more, the name of the Sovereign has been for the first time, I would almost say, besmirched in the arena of political conflict. Now I say that this is a most unhappy state of things, not only for the Crown itself, but for the House of Commons and the other House of Parliament. It would almost seem to me—listening to the enunciations made in “another place”—not by a noble Duke, but a man who uses the purest English and never is mistaken in his meaning—that there is a mysterious power behind the Throne who tenders most unconstitutional and obnoxious advice, and who, not content with being the presiding genius of the Government, strives to control the rights and privileges of this House. I hope—without adding my petroleum to that of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves)—the House will resist anything of that kind; and if this House is to be dissolved, I, for one, think the sooner the better, for, however inconvenient it may be to us, it is better that great public questions should be set at rest, once and for ever, and I hope, too, that the appeal will not be made, as I see signs of doing, on the old historic cry of "Our Protestant Queen and No Popery!" ["Oh, oh!"] Yes, I have seen signs of that in speeches that have been made on the other side, and I think I see an hon. Gentleman opposite, who is probably preparing to follow me, who will raise that ill-omened cry through the country. Let us get through the necessary business as soon as we may; and I, for one, much as I should dislike a visit to my constituents, and not looking for place in another Government, but looking to the vast interests of this country, and putting my "personal claims" entirely on one side—which, mark you, is not always done by other people—I for one say, the sooner this House is dissolved, and the great issue put before the country, the better will it be for the Sovereign of these realms and the Constitution of the country.

COLONEL STUART KNOX said, he did not know whether he was the person alluded to by the hon. Gentleman. [Mr. OSBORNE: No; I never thought of you.] At all events, what he would say was, "Justice to all, and no surrender of the rights which belong to us." His object, however, in rising, was to remind the right hon. Member for South Lancashire that it was only on Thursday last he accused an hon. and gallant Friend of his of want of courtesy in asking questions without notice. Now, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, whether it was only the Leader of a factious Opposition, after a meeting of the party at his house, one of the would-be leaders of whom—the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie)—had lately called them "a table," who thought himself entitled to ask questions without notice; for it was evident from what had occurred that the right hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. Disraeli) had received no notice of the Question that had been asked.

MR. HORSMAN: I hope, Sir, the House will not allow itself to be led away from the important Question before it by matter unconnected with that question, but that we shall receive from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government some further information with respect to the audience with which he was honoured by Her Majesty last week, and as to the relations of the House to the Ministers of the Crown in consequence of the advice he gave, and the manner in which it was received. Like my me (Mr. perplexe made by thought I I felt my his second hearing h not unde my right tract an hope we a —Did the Majesty t tuencies a the speed whether I an appeal otituencies soon as t allow. T which we. statement tleman to that he h solve Pea understo the resign tars; that the resign an unequal Parliamen Gentleman ment and assent, it never into but at the morning t mended se Her Major at once d but that i cumstance a general knowledge rations of Now that conveyed Gentleman more fully Duke of stated that of her Mi constitution position se on our de stances ma scarcely a from the t tings, I will not call them the deliberations, of the House. Then the Duke of Richmond, having more fully explained what was conveyed by the right hon. Gentleman, made very frequent, unusually frequent, use of Her Majesty's name, to show that Her Majesty had given her Ministers power to resort to dissolution at any moment or for any purpose whenever they might say they had a difficulty with the House of Commons. Now the points on which I wish on the part of the House to have an answer from the right hon. Gentleman are these:—First, did he advise Her Majesty to dissolve or appeal to the present constituencies? The second question is, did he advise Her Majesty to intrust him with a general power of dissolution to be used whenever he thought fit to advise it; and the third is, did Her Majesty authorize her Ministers to communicate to Parliament that we were to deliberate subject to the summary exercise of that power? These are all points of importance, more especially as I gather from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, confirmed and strengthened by that of the Duke of Richmond, that powers have been granted as stated, although I do not believe that such powers were for one moment thought of by Her Majesty. It is conveyed to us, however, that the right hon. Gentleman possesses those powers, and that we are deliberating under a threat of their summary exercise at any moment that we happen to place the Government in difficulties. I say we have a right to know, and must know, whether those are the powers which the Government profess to have; and we must enforce the knowledge, because the character of this House and its independence and dignity are involved in the answer.

Mr. Osborne

Mr. GOLDSMID said, he had another question to ask, which he thought the Government should answer—namely, Whether, if the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills were passed, a measure would be introduced whereby the registration under those Bills should be made in the autumn? The right hon. Gentleman proposed to go on with the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, and immediately after to proceed to appeal to the new constituencies. He would ask, What, then, was the result of the vote of last Thursday, which was a Vote of Want of Confidence? It appeared to him that Her Majesty's Government had entirely disregarded the vote of Thursday last; and if the business of the House was brought to a deadlock, as the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves) had said, it was brought to a deadlock by Her Majesty's Ministers who clung to Office. It was a matter of complete indifference to him who occupied the position of Prime Minister, but it seemed to him entirely unconstitutional to hold over that House a threat of dissolution, which was to occur at an indefinite time.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Graves), that it was high time that the private Members of the House, whether representing large or small constituencies, should speak out. When the present House of Commons was elected, nothing had been heard of the disestablishment or disendowment of the Irish Church. Reform was the great question of the hour, and it had remained so up to the present time. The English Bill had been passed, and the Government now asked the House to complete the Scotch and Irish measures and the Boundary Bills before venturing upon a dissolution, which might jeopardize its completion. On the new question of the Irish Church, the country had as yet had no opportunity of forming an opinion. On what grounds, and for what objects were these discussions continued then? During the past two or three days they had been maintained by some half-dozen hungry expectants of Office, and, if such a course were allowed to continue, the electors would justly complain that the whole of the most important business of the country was stopped, merely for the purpose of gratifying the ambition of certain right hon. Gentlemen. By such a course, however, they could probably remind their representatives that they were returned to legislate for the good of the country, and not until the right hon. Member for South Lancashire thought it necessary as a means to dislodge his great adversary from Office, for the personal interest of those who sought to obtain seats in a new Cabinet. It appeared to him that such an exhibition of faction was never before made by an Opposition, manifestly for the object of displacing one Government, and re-instating another.

Mr. WHITBREAD said he wished, as a humble Member of the House, to add his protest to that of his right hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Bouverie), when he denounced the impropriety of introducing the name of the Sovereign in the way in which it had been done by the Prime Minister.

He had never expected to hear a Minister come down to the House, as the right hon. Gentleman had last evening, and shelter himself behind the Throne. He also wished to join with the right hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), and insist on direct answers to the questions he had put. The House wished to know, whether the Prime Minister had it in his power to dissolve the House at any moment? He could not understand, nor could he believe that the Sovereign had given such power to the right hon. Gentleman. He therefore wished to hear from the Prime Minister, whether the prevailing impression was founded on the truth; and, if not, to hear him distinctly deny that the Sovereign had given him the power his words had led the House to believe he possessed? On the other hand, presuming the right hon. Gentleman to have the power of dissolution in his pocket, he wished to know for what purpose and on what account it was to be used? Was it to be used because of the result of the first division on the Irish Church—the majority of 60? No; the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to let that vote pass if the House would permit him to continue sitting on the Treasury Bench. Was the House to be dissolved because of the second vote, when the majority against the Government was swelled to 65? No; the right hon. Gentleman was content to allow these votes to pass if the House would allow him to remain on the Treasury Bench. Was the power to be used if the House declared for the second and third Resolutions by a still greater majority? No; the right hon. Gentleman had told them that if he were still permitted to sit on the Treasury Bench he would regard those Resolutions as the natural corollaries of the first. Was it to be used if the House, on considering the Scotch Reform Bill, decided that the number of Scotch Members should be increased by some other means than by adding to the number of the House? Upon this point the right hon. Gentleman had not enlightened the House; but information on the subject was necessary; because he, in common with others, wished to amend the Scotch and Irish Bills, and he wished to know whether, they could do that freely and independently, or whether they would deliberate in the constant fear of dissolution? Was the power to be used after the Irish Reform Bill had been taken out of the hands of the Government and moulded by the House? Was it to be used if the Estimates were cut down? Or for what was it to be used? The right hon. Gentleman knew as well as possible that the question of the Irish Church would be advanced just as much this year with him in Office as it would be if he were in Opposition. The right hon. Gentleman had stated he was prepared to accept the second and third Resolutions, but was silent on the declaration of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire that it would be necessary to proceed with a Bill to suspend the action of the Crown regarding the patronage of the Irish Church. Would the power be used when that Bill was passed by the House? The right hon. Gentleman knew quite well that the Irish Church question would be referred to the country, whatever Government was in Office, as soon as it was possible to appeal to the new constituencies. He knew it was in the power of no Government unduly to delay appealing to those constituencies. Then for what did he sit on the Treasury Bench? What principle did he maintain by persisting in retaining Office? The right hon. Gentleman was not there to oppose the action of the Opposition on the question of the Irish Church; he was not there to defend his own view of the Scotch or Irish Reform Bills: respecting all these matters he was "in the hands of the House." If the right hon. Gentleman went to the country he had evidently only one available cry, and that was the old one of "No Surrender," with the clear understanding that it was limited strictly, at all times and under all circumstances, to the tenure of his own place.

Mr. Whitbread

MR. LOWE: I cannot persuade myself that it is the wish of hon. Gentlemen in this House, not even of the hon. Members for Liverpool and Beverley (Mr. Graves and Sir Henry Edwards), that this discussion should come to an end without some answer having been given to the Questions put by my right hon. Friend at the beginning of the evening; and it is only as a forlorn hope, and on the adventuresome expedition of trying once more to get an answer to that Question, that I trouble the House for one moment. I do not offer any comment on the subject now; but I entreat hon. Gentleman opposite, out of regard for their own character, out of regard for the august name which has been dragged into this debate, out of regard for the character of this House and what will be thought of us in the country, not to have it said that a simple, straightforward Question has been put to the Government and that the Government has avoided answering it. ["No, no!"] Is it not so? My right hon. Friend, quoting the speech of the Duke of Richmond, asked the First Minister of the Crown whether he disavowed or adopted that speech. That was a very simple question; but how was it answered? The right hon. Gentleman re-stated what he said last night as to his own communication with the Crown; but my right hon. Friend knew his duty far too well to ask the right hon. Gentleman to describe to the House what took place between him and the Sovereign. It is in the discretion of the right hon. Gentleman, as First Minister of the Crown, to decide what portion of his communication with Her Majesty it is consistent with his duty, subject to Her Majesty's Royal permission, to lay before this House. He was not asked to enlarge upon his own statement; he was asked whether he avowed or disavowed the statement of the Duke of Richmond; not what took place between him and Her Majesty, but as to the accuracy or inaccuracy of the statement made by a Member of his own Cabinet in "another place." He was asked simply to say, "Do you endorse that statement—aye or no?" That question was in the first place evaded, and then followed up by the rejoinder, "You had better ask the Duke of Richmond himself." That is the whole answer given by the first Minister of the Crown, and it is one on which I think I need not dilate. But not only has the question been evaded; another has been substituted for it, because the right hon. Gentleman was followed by his Secretary of State for India. The right hon. Member for the city of Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) read the speech of the Duke of Richmond a second time, and added some words by way of a commentary, in which he characterized the speech as a menace. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India jumps up and says, "The question of menace is easily answered." But that was not the question put by my right hon. Friend; he wanted to know whether the construction put on the speech of the Duke of Richmond was a right construction or not; whether, in fact, that speech was the speech of the Government; whether the Government stood by it or not. Now, Sir, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will allow that in stating the case I have done it with all due regard for the amenities of debate; and therefore, if I enjoy his good opinion, which I am sure I must have earned by the manner in which I have introduced the subject, I will take the liberty of doing what I presume will be not disagreeable to the right hon. Gentleman; I will read over the words of the Duke of Richmond, and again ask the Government whether the Government avows them or not. Well, Sir, for the third and last time of asking, the Duke of Richmond said—

"The result is that we still occupy the same position we did before, and intend to conduct the affairs of the country so long as we are able to do so; and in the event of any difficulties arising Her Majesty was graciously pleased to state that she would make no objection to a dissolution of Parliament. It, of course, will depend upon the state of affairs whether that dissolution shall be a dissolution under the existing constituency, or whether it shall be a dissolution under the new constituency to be formed under the Reform Act; but Her Majesty was graciously pleased to state that she would make no objection to either course being adopted by her Advisers whenever they should see fit to tender to Her Majesty a recommendation on that subject."—[3 Hansard, cxcii. 1690.]

I ask the right hon. Gentleman, are these words the words of the Government—Aye or No?

MR. DISRAELI: I address the House for the second time; but under the circumstances perhaps they will allow me to do so. It has been stated that the name of the Sovereign has been improperly introduced into these debates—not so by me. I have introduced that august name in the spirit of our Constitution, with the permission of Her Majesty, and I know well, in a manner which cannot be impugned. A great many questions have been addressed to me, varying in terms, but probably having the same end, and when they have been answered, a new one has been proposed, a new form of inquiry has been made, and then we have been charged with not replying. Now, I do not approve myself the mode by which the inquiry as to the conduct of the Government is made. It consists of bringing before the House—without any notice whatever—an extract from a newspaper report of observations alleged to have been made by one of my Colleagues in "another place," with whom by no possibility can I have had any communication on the subject, and then founding upon that extract a variety of inferences which have immediately been fixed upon me, as if I had committed myself to every conclusion which every speaker has thought it right to make. I shall not address myself to points like that, but to the great points of interest to the House. The advice that I gave to Her Majesty to dissolve the Parliament was confined solely to the question of the Irish Church. And if any other difficulty arises in the conduct of affairs, upon which it occurred to me and my Colleagues that such advice should be given with reference to any other subject, it would be our duty then again to repair to Her Majesty and give that advice. The consent of Her Majesty is solely to the issue upon which Her Majesty's consent was required—namely, the question of the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland. That is my answer, and I hope a complete answer to those various forms of questions which have been urged in this House. Then the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) says—"You accepted the first and second divisions upon the question of the Irish Church, and you are no longer resisting our policy upon that question." I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I am not going to assent at all, either to the second or the third Resolution. I said that for the sake of expediting Public Business, looking on these Resolutions as corollaries of the first, I should not sanction any lengthened debates or organized divisions, at the same time that I should urge against them my most decided negative. In making that admission, for the sake of the convenience of the House and with a view of expediting public business, I did not for one moment mean to say—and I am sure the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire never for a moment supposed that I admitted—because I undertook in the spirit which I have already described not to oppose the second or third Resolutions in as peremptory a manner as I should otherwise have done—that I was in consequence pledged in any way not to oppose the Bill that he is about to bring forward. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will not for a moment pretend that he concluded I was not going to oppose his Bill. And therefore the argument of the hon. Member for Bedford is totally illusory, and founded upon an assumption for which there is no warrant whatever. I repeat, then, to the House that the advice which I tendered to Her Majesty respecting the dissolution, and the consent of Her Majesty to dissolve Parliament, referred solely to the subject of the disestablishment of the Church, and was confined solely to that subject. Then I am taunted with this inquiry—"Why did you not immediately dissolve Parliament?" Well, Sir, everyone must know that we are placed with restrictions of character public interest to arrive; House, and progress greatest from no to shrink advice, moment, well the assumption an assumption thing I which Parliament than the

Mr. L. independent dangerous to carry of the H occasion of danger before ne nings; a partisan, both sides tremely Ministers he could to occupy honour to country, or rejection ally npe tion was the name forward and that himself u he was j point out tion of al had been ment ple which ap by the H doubted prove th whether ready in nion of quently, proffered Majesty bended n dissolution some further explanation from the First Minister. He believed, in common with many other Members of the House, that something in the nature of an in terrorem influence was being exercised by the Government over the House of Commons. What was the meaning to be attached to the words which had been used by the First Minister—"If, in the transaction of the necessary business, any difficulties should arise, &c.?" Did the right hon. Gentleman mean that, in the event of a collision, or opposition to any measure necessary to complete the business of the Session, the Government would use the power—which they undoubtedly possessed—of dissolving Parliament? A doubt existed in his mind whether those words were not intended to control the free action of that House, and he for one deprecated any such attempt. Having appealed to the Government for an explanation on that point, he would now appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite. The House had unmistakably evinced its feeling on the question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, and they knew that the Government had obtained permission from Her Majesty to dissolve Parliament upon that question. Was it any use, then, to continue to battle upon this ground to the obstruction of all other business? Even if the Resolutions were all agreed to, no man in his senses believed that it would be practicable to pass a Bill founded upon them this Session. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire said he intended to bring in a Suspensory Bill. But, even if he succeeded in passing it through the House of Commons, he was hardly credulous enough to believe that it would succeed in the House of Lords. He therefore asked the House to set its face against any further waste of time. He had sat in that House for seventeen years, and he never remembered, and he did not suppose the oldest Member could recollect Public Business in such a state of arrear as at present. After the declaration of the Government, and knowing that a dissolution was to take place on the specific question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, he would ask the House to let them proceed to carry through the absolutely necessary business uncontrolled by any idea of menace or penalties. Let them proceed as quickly as possible to pass the measures necessary to complete the "Reform Programme," and then the country would respond to the appeal made to it.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that last year he said, in reference to the Reform Bill, "Pass the Bill, and then, if you please, turn out the Ministry;" and he now asked the right hon. Gentleman to keep his word.

MR. WHALLEY expressed his feeling that the circumstances before them, which were alleged as a difficulty, were in reality the reason why there should be an immediate dissolution of Parliament. The question of the disestablishment of the Irish Church involved the English Church as well, and the right hon. Gentleman had now an opportunity of obtaining an expression of the opinion of the country under the present constituencies on a larger scale than any Minister had enjoyed on any question upon record. He called upon the right hon. Gentleman to act upon the authority he had received from Her Majesty, by dissolving Parliament in spite of all consequences as soon as the immediate exigencies of Public Business could be provided for, and if the right hon. Gentleman did not adopt that course he (Mr. Whalley) should be prepared to support the right hon. Member for South Lancashire in a Vote of Want of Confidence, or in any other course he might pursue.

MR. GLADSTONE: I wish to make an explanation with regard to an observation of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, who found fault with me, not without some justice as far as the letter of the matter was concerned, for some words used by me this evening. I stated that it was not competent for me to speak last night after I had addressed the House once. That was not true in the letter, but it was true in the spirit. I followed the right hon. Gentleman last evening, and the Motion for the adjournment was not made till after I had spoken. I therefore thought I had lost my opportunity of speaking again, though, of course, I might have spoken again on the question of adjournment, as the right hon. Gentleman himself did.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, references had been made in the course of the discussion to noble Lords speaking in "another place" by name, and there had been quotations from the ipsissima verba of the Earl of Malmesbury and the Duke of Richmond. He wished to know whether that was justified by the rules of the House. He did not desire to narrow the rules of the House in this particular; but he should be glad of the opinion of the Speaker upon the point, in order that they might arrive at uniformity of conduct. It would be a great satisfaction to him personally if the Speaker declared that all Members of the House might make use of similar references whenever the occasion justified it, and that such privilege should not be confined to those who were more distinguished only.

MR. SPEAKER said, the rule of the House was that allusion to debates in the other House was not in order; but it was hardly possible that under all circumstances that rule could be absolutely and literally complied with, especially when declarations had been made by Ministers of the Crown on points affecting the position of the House of Commons.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am anxious to state, for the information and convenience of the House, a point in connection with my third Resolution. The third Resolution, in point of form, hangs upon the second Resolution, because it refers to "the purpose aforesaid"—namely, the purpose of preventing the growth of new vested interests and restraining the operation of Commissioners. I propose, for the convenience of the House, in order that the Address upon the third Resolution may contain the whole substance of the Resolutions, to insert words in the third Resolution which will bring in that part of the substance of the second Resolution which is necessary fully to express its sense.

MR. DISRAELI: I should like to see those words in print.

MR. GLADSTONE: Oh, certainly; most unquestionably. Besides putting them in print I wish to take this public opportunity of drawing attention to them. They will be in print to-morrow morning.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY—MILITARY EDUCATION.

RESOLUTION.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL, in rising to move an Address to the Crown, on the subject of Military Education, said, he brought forward a similar Motion two years ago, when, in a House of 284 Members, it was lost by 20. On that occasion he was supported by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, by the Secretaries of State for the Home Department and for India, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, besides other Members of Her Majesty's Government. On the other hand,

Mr. Darby Griffith

he had to deplore the opposition of the noble Lord the late Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington), more, he hoped and believed, from a natural disinclination to upset the determination of his predecessors than from any abstract love for the present system of education at the Military Colleges. He felt sanguine, however, that on a full consideration of the whole question, and of the events that had recently occurred at Sandhurst, his Motion would receive the support of many of those who had previously voted against it. Very few changes of importance had been made at Sandhurst College since he last brought the question before the House, and matters had gone on from bad to worse there. If half of what was stated to have occurred at Sandhurst last autumn was true, not only was there a great want of respect for all discipline there, but also a want of respect for the property and even for the lives of Her Majesty's subjects. On the 28th October, 1867, a number of the cadets of Sandhurst College entered the shop of a jeweller of the Jewish persuasion, smashed everything in their way, and attacked and maltreated the jeweller himself. For several succeeding nights the cadets marched about in compact bodies, letting off fireworks and creating great disturbances and universal alarm. On the 1st November they went again to the jeweller's shop, smashed the fanlight over his door, and discharged fireworks. Next day they endeavoured unsuccessfully to batter in his shop front, and did considerable damage; and on other occasions they seriously injured a woman, set fire to a skittle alley, and were guilty of exceedingly riotous conduct. On one of the days in question, which fell on a Sunday, strong measures were taken for the preservation of discipline; but the cadets in the evening assembled near St. Michael's church during the performance of Divine service, and kept up a hideous noise, consisting of cat-calls, yells, shouting, &c. He would not pass any comment upon this picture of insubordination, riot, and irreverence, for it spoke for itself; but he wished to impress upon the House that these things must have had a cause, and that that cause was to be found in the present system of training and education at the Military Colleges. When he brought the question before the House before, he dwelt minutely upon the rigorous treatment of the cadets, who were not boys, but young men of eighteen or nineteen—but the fact was he had under-stated the case. The want of discipline was as much due to injudicious indulgence as to injudicious rigour. The cadets had uncomfortable dormitories and want of privacy; they were subjected to an irritating schoolboy treatment, and beyond all that they were exposed, by the very action of the authorities themselves, to every species of temptation. Until lately not only had the publichouses at Sandhurst been thrown open to them, but a canteen had been established within the College itself, where smoking, drinking, and billiard playing went on; and the attractions of these places, as compared with the bare walls and sanded floors of their dormitories, led to a spirit of lawlessness which vented itself sometimes in petty acts of wanton mischief, such as smashing lamps and windows; and at other times into acts of more serious insubordination. The large and increasing class of cadets who came from "cramming" establishments, and who, possessing more money than brains, found it easier to spend a year at College and purchase a commission than to compete for one at Chelsea, exercised a prejudicial influence; and something was also due to the pernicious distinction between the executive officers and the professors of the College—and that applied to both Colleges—by which the power of punishment was maintained in one set of hands while that of imparting instruction was placed in another. And that brought him to what was, after all, the object for which these Colleges were founded—namely, the nature of the education given them. He admitted that the education given in the Military Colleges was good in some points; but the question was, whether it might not be better. The right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe), than whom there was no better judge of education, objected during the Recess, in one of those speeches which all must admire, even though they did not concur in them, to the unpractical character of our University and public school training. Now, the same remark would apply to the Military Colleges; yet the military profession was one which urgently required a practical education. Too many subjects had to be got up in too short a time, thus leading to cramming combined with the most absolute ignorance even of the elements of professional education. At Woolwich a cadet had to perfect himself in two years and a-half in at least a dozen subjects, including the higher mathematics and natural science, but he was not taught riding until the last year of his academical course, and he was so badly instructed in drill, especially sword drill, that it had to be learnt over again on his joining the regiment. At Sandhurst, almost as many subjects had to be mastered in eighteen or—deducting vacations—in thirteen months; and it used to be, and probably was still, proverbial that young officers coming thence had to unlearn all their drill. Considering our East and West India experiences, it was strange that young officers were not instructed in military law, in the practice of Courts-martial, and regimental economy, which included a knowledge of the weight, price, and quality of the soldier's arms, necessaries, and accoutrements—subjects of the utmost value to the officer. A colloquial knowledge of a foreign language was also exceedingly useful; but examinations being no longer vind voce, he believed it was not to be acquired at Woolwich or Sandhurst; and if a cadet were able to string two sentences together in a foreign tongue, it was to be attributed more to his previous training than to collegiate instruction. The students were assembled thirty or forty together in a hall and were expected, while other teaching was going on around them, to solve the most difficult problems in mathematics and natural science—private study being so much discouraged that it was difficult to get permission to read for examinations after the lights were put out. The consequence of this Procrustean system, if he might so call it, was that no cadet really had his talents turned to advantage. Nobody took care to ascertain what speciality he was fitted for, and it followed that many young officers of great parts and attainments were completely lost to the State so far as their particular talents were concerned. He would next refer to the cost of maintaining the Military Colleges—a matter which the educational defects of those institutions brought out only the more prominently. Without troubling the House with an array of figures, he might mention the fact that, exclusive of all the expenses paid for education and maintenance by the parents and guardians of the cadets, the two Colleges at Woolwich and Sandhurst cost over £35,000 a year to the State. The cost of the maintenance of an individual cadet at Woolwich was £200 a year, or 30 or 40 per cent higher than the cost of the education imparted at the most expensive of our public schools, such as Eton and Harrow; 60 or 80 per cent higher than what was paid at less costly establishments, and, as he was informed, 100 per cent higher than the expenses of education at the French College at St. Cyr. If these figures were analyzed, it would be found that the education of the cadet, unlike that of the public school-boy, cost two-thirds of the whole sum, and the maintenance one-third; and the cause of this astounding result would appear to be in the fact that there was one professor, or executive officer to every six cadets, a number that could not reasonably be increased, if the professors were all dry nurses and the cadets all children in leading strings. There was a time when things were very different, for about twenty-five or thirty years ago, in the days of Sir George Scovell, not only did Sandhurst pay its own expenses, but it contributed £1,000 a year besides to the Treasury. He might possibly be told that all these things were thoroughly inquired into in 1857 in the days of Lord Panmure. That was perfectly true; but he would ask, what attention had been paid to the Report of the Commissioners of that time, confirmed as it was by the Minister of the day, and sanctioned by Her Majesty? In their Report the Commissioners recommended among other things the amalgamation of the two Colleges. Then followed naturally the question, why was that Report not attended to? The answer was to be found in the debate which took place on the Motion of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), on the 28th of April, 1858. It had, he believed, been erroneously supposed that the House of Commons on that occasion rejected the proposal for the amalgamation of the two Colleges. Had they done so, his Motion would still not have been affected; but an examination into that debate would, he thought, show that the House was not averse to the amalgamation of the two Colleges, but to the amalgamation of the two Colleges into the College of Sandhurst as it was then constituted, the objection arising from the fact that the House disapproved the system of selection which prevailed at Sandhurst, while it approved the system of competition which prevailed at Woolwich. In any case, the lapse of time, the outbreaks which had since occurred, and the reluctance on the part of every War Minister to deal with the question, on account of the adverse vote supposed to have been arrived at by the House of Commons, were in themselves reasons sufficient why a fresh inquiry should be instituted. In his Motion he had included the subject of military education, because he thought that the inquiry into the military organization and education at Sandhurst ought to be accompanied by an inquiry into the great question of the previous training and examination of all candidates for the army. He hoped, too, that the public schools might be induced to co-operate in this matter, and that by the establishment of classes for practical military education they might be able to strike a blow at what might be termed—whether viewed in a physical, educational, or in a moral point of view—a most factitious system of education—he meant the “cramming” system. He thought, too, that it would be a very proper subject for consideration to inquire whether it would be possible to improve in any way the practical education of our Volunteer and Militia officers. It would also be in his opinion advisable that the reason for the falling off of the candidates for school-masterships at the Normal Schools at Chelsea should be inquired into, as well as the effect which the recent introduction of recreations and amusements for the benefit of soldiers had exercised upon drunkenness in the army. He had now completed the charges which he had thought it necessary to bring forward against the Military Colleges; he had endeavoured to prove that their discipline was bad, their education defective, and their cost extravagant. To his own mind the remedy was clear. What was required was, in the first place, a searching inquiry, to be followed by the amalgamation of the two Colleges, as recommended by the Council of Military Education, on an entirely different basis. If he was right in anticipating what would be the probable effect of a Commission of Inquiry, he might hope to see the day when a military University would be founded somewhat upon the basis of that admirable College of West Point which existed in the United States, and which had been the mother of so much military talent during the late American war, where candidates would receive a really practical education in military matters, and where those who passed would receive their commissions quite as much for their good conduct as for their proficiency in study. There was another reason why it was especially important that an inquiry should take place at the present time. The system of purchase might at no distant date be either abolished or considerably modified, and in that event it would be of the greatest importance that there should be a military University, through which officers should be compelled to pass; due provision, of course, being made for a certain number of promotions from the ranks. The noble Lord apologized to the House for having brought on a very dry subject after a very exciting one; but he felt assured that, although he might have detained hon. Members a long time, he should not have detained them too long if he succeeded in inducing them to accept his Motion, which he thoroughly believed would promote the interests of the army and of the country. He would conclude by moving—

Lord Eustace Cecil

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a Royal Commission composed of Military and Civilian Members be appointed to inquire into the present state of Military Education in this Country, and more especially into the training of Candidates for Commissions in the Army, and into the Constitution, system of Education, and discipline of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, as well as into the rules and regulations under which Candidates are admitted into those Colleges.”

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I am afraid my experience in connection with the army and military matters is not sufficient to justify me in pronouncing opinions to which any value can be attached on the various questions raised by the speech and Motion of my noble Friend; but when my noble Friend gave notice of this Motion I felt it my duty to give my most careful attention to the consideration of the subject; and I accordingly consulted a considerable number of those military men of long experience and high authority in whose judgment I felt I could confide. The result of my reflection and inquiry has been that I consider it my duty to accede to my noble Friend's Motion. I am quite sure that every Gentleman now present will feel that no apology was necessary on the part of my noble Friend for bringing forward a subject to which he has given great attention, and which he has now introduced to the House in a speech of great clearness; and, although he terms the subject a very dry one, I must differ more from him on that point than on the merits of the Motion, for, whatever our individual opinions on it may be, everyone must acknowledge that it relates to a subject bearing in the most direct and important manner on the interests of the army. Such inquiries as I have been able to make convince me that among military men generally there is a very strong feeling that the state of military education in this country is not altogether satisfactory. I cannot myself presume to give any opinion which would be worth considering as to whether it be desirable that our army should be made more a professional army than it is at present. It seems to me, however, that there are very strong grounds for believing that our army would be improved and our officers rendered more efficient and more competent to discharge their duties if the army were made a more professional army than it now is, and this is also the opinion of many officers who have given the most careful consideration to the matter. It is essential, in order to attain that object, that the early training of our officers should be more systematic and complete than at present; and here let me remind the House that this is by no means a new question. On the contrary, it was dealt with, and nearly completed, by the late Lord Herbert in 1860 and 1861, when he was Secretary of State for War. Lord Herbert was desirous that, as regards the Line, the Cavalry, and the Guards, all candidates for commissions should pass through Sandhurst, and that from 500 to 600 cadets should be taught there. This proposal of Lord Herbert was carried out so far that it obtained the approval of the Treasury; and, in the Estimates for 1861-2, a sum of £15,000 was actually introduced, and voted, I believe, by the House, for erecting suitable buildings for the accommodation of 500 cadets; and in the following financial year, 1862-3, though the number of cadets was then estimated at 400 only, a Vote of £12,700 was placed in the Estimates for carrying out the arrangements for extending the establishment at Sandhurst. But this intention to create a great military College was abandoned in consequence of an objection which was raised on the part of our great English Universities. At least, I have been told that that was the reason why the idea dropped after having been so far carried into execution; but I am not disposed to think that such objection on the part of the Universities ought to be entertained or persevered in. If my noble Friend's Motion should result in the recommendations which are likely to be made by the Commission, I should regret that the objections raised by the Universities should be allowed to interfere with the plan proposed. I can only consider the interference of the Universities as practically mischievous, for the result of it has been to bring to Sandhurst—the privilege, I may remark, does not apply to Woolwich—young men of an age which makes them utterly unfit for anything like education in a seminary of that kind; while, at the same time, the maintenance of discipline has been rendered extremely difficult. And here let me call the attention of the House for a moment to one very serious defect in our present system, in consequence of the ages at which young men enter the institutions at Woolwich and Sandhurst, and in consequence also of the reservation to which I have referred in favour of the Universities. The subject was under serious consideration by myself, in conjunction with the Commander in Chief, in January last, when—at the request of his Royal Highness—I attended a meeting at the Horse Guards. The Commander in Chief was himself present at that meeting, which was also attended by the Council of Military Education. The age of the students in the Colleges was taken into our serious consideration, and we came to a determination to make an important alteration in this respect. At present young men cannot enter Sandhurst or Woolwich before they are sixteen years old, nor remain there after they are nineteen. We agreed that it was desirable to reduce the period of instruction to two years, and to admit students from the fifteenth to the seventeenth years of their age. The House must, however, bear in mind that young men are at present allowed to enter the institution at Sandhurst when they are as much as twenty-one years of age, and to remain there, if intended for the cavalry, until they are twenty-three. The result is, that very few young men avail themselves of the opportunity afforded them by this system. Young men are allowed to come to Sandhurst from the Universities at twenty-three years of age, and the result is that they cannot obtain their commissions and commence their military career until they are twenty-five years of age. It therefore appears to me that the ages at which cadets are permitted to enter these Colleges should be reduced, so that the young men may commence their military career and training at an earlier age. This reduction in the ages of the cadets entering the Colleges was discussed at a meeting of the Council of Military Education, held at the Horse Guards in January last; but in consequence of the intention of my noble

Sir John Pakington

Friend to move for the appointment of a Royal Commission being communicated to us, it was resolved, with the concurrence of his Royal Highness the Commander in Chief, not to make any absolute orders that cadets must enter the Colleges at an earlier age than was now permitted until after the subject had been considered by that Commission. Let me now call the attention of the House to the result of admitting young men to Woolwich at the ages—namely, from sixteen to nineteen—to which I have already adverted. I hold in my hand a Paper giving the ages of the cadets who were at Woolwich on the 1st of the present month, from which I find the average age of the whole number of cadets at that establishment to be nineteen years and two months; that of the young men in the first class being as high as twenty, while the age of the oldest cadet in the first class was twenty one years and eight months, rendering it impossible that he could obtain his commission until he was twenty-two or twenty-three years of age, whereas cadets should commence their military career at eighteen years of age. My noble Friend, towards the close of his speech, touched upon a subject which I think is one worthy the consideration of the Royal Commission about to be appointed—namely, the system of what is commonly and familiarly called “cramming,” from which great evils have resulted. There is, however, a subject of extreme importance and delicacy to which my noble Friend did not allude, but which it may be thought may well form one of the points for the consideration of the Commission. I must confess that I have never been a very zealous convert to the system of competitive examination; and I am disposed to think that those who believed firmly in that system have had their faith in it a good deal shaken in consequence of circumstances in connection with it that have recently transpired. I have been informed on unquestionable authority—and I can assure the House that I make the statement with great pain and regret, and I should, therefore, be extremely sorry were I in the slightest degree to over-state the case—that one of the effects of the system of competitive examination has been to lead to painful and serious irregularities and demoralization at the cramming schools. I quite believe there are many of those establishments which are conducted with every propriety and with every respectability; but these terms of praise do not, I am sorry to say, apply to all of them. At some of those establishments—and I fear at not a few—the principle acted upon is this: “You, the pupil, must give me, the teacher, so many hours in the day”—which generally is a large demand upon the time of the cadet, usually some nine or ten hours in the day—“and when those hours are over you may go where and do what you like.” I am informed upon authority I cannot doubt that this is the system in force in too many of these establishments. Indeed, among my own private acquaintance, I know of a few cases in which young men, or boys, sent to these schools have come to their parents and entreated to be removed from them, on the ground of the irregularities and demoralization that prevailed there. It is a most serious question that any system should be allowed to exist under which the youth of this country, the sons of our gentry, cannot be trained to this noble profession without being tainted and demoralized at these ill-conducted establishments. So strongly was I impressed by the statements made to me upon this subject that, at the meeting of the Council of Military Education that was held at the Horse Guards in January last, I thought it to be my duty to suggest that they should take the matter into their consideration with the view of putting an end to this unfortunate state of affairs. A Committee (of which the Rev. Canon Moseley was a Member) of that Council was appointed to consider the subject and to make a Report upon it, and in the Report they made they recommended that a system of inspection of these schools should be established; but, after giving the subject very careful consideration, considerable doubt exists as to whether we shall be able to carry that recommendation into effect. Had it been clear that we could have introduced such a system with effect I should not have now mentioned the subject. I think, however, that the House will agree with me that the existing state of things is a most painful one, and is worthy any amount of inquiry to see if it cannot possibly be put a stop to. If establishments of this kind must exist, and cadets must attend them as an indispensable step to military service, they ought to be placed under such regulations as would remove the dangers to which I have thought it right thus briefly to advert. My noble Friend gave many reasons for embracing so many topics in his Commission. I do not ask him to alter the terms of his Motion; but I hope that when the Commission is appointed they will not extend their inquiries beyond what is absolutely required for a full elucidation of the subject. I regard the objects of this Commission as of great importance, and as being intimately connected with the efficiency of the army, and with the proper training of our youth who are educating themselves for that noble profession. I also agree with the noble Lord in thinking that the question whether the institutions at Woolwich and at Sandhurst might not be beneficially amalgamated is one worthy the serious consideration of the Commission, to the appointment of which I have now great pleasure in giving my assent.

MR. MONSELL wished to say a few words with reference to the somewhat disparaging remarks of the right hon. Gentleman on the system of competitive examination at Woolwich. Experience proved that system to be a complete success both intellectually and morally. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary for War had spoken of the cramming establishments, as if the system of cramming and the demoralization consequent upon its adoption were naturally connected with the system of competitive examination. Taking into consideration the number of cadets that had formerly to be sent away from the Woolwich establishment on account of the immorality that prevailed there, and the entreaties which were often formerly made by some of those cadets whose minds had remained uncontaminated to be taken away from that sink of vice, he thought the improvement which had been introduced into that establishment by the adoption of the system of competitive examination was enormous. With regard to the proposed amalgamation of Sandhurst and Woolwich, in a former debate difficulties were suggested that still existed with as much force as ever. It was clear that if they were amalgamated, by far the greater proportion of pupils would be destined for the Line, and not for the scientific corps; and the necessary and natural result would be that education would be conducted with regard to the requirements of the non-scientific rather than the scientific corps. On the question of reducing the age at which pupils were admitted, he would urge them to look at the practice in other countries. There was in France an institution corresponding to that suggested by the noble Lord, for the general education of cadets, and yet, although pupils were admitted to the Ecole Polytechnique from the ages of sixteen to twenty, there were hardly any admissions under seventeen, and very few between seventeen and eighteen, and the majority were between the ages of eighteen and twenty. It would be almost impossible for Artillery and Engineer officers to receive a proper scientific education, supposing the course to be two years, if they were to enter at an earlier age. It seemed to him it would prevent the possibility of the scientific corps receiving the education necessary to fit them for the proper discharge of their duties if the age were reduced. As to the results of the competitive system he was assured on the highest authority, that nothing could be more marked than the increased application and industry which had followed its introduction. Formerly young men who studied were laughed at, but now study was the rule. Again, the standard of scientific acquirements was higher for cadets entering the Royal Military Academy than it was formerly, for the commission examinations. So far from the gentleman-like tone being impaired by the competitive system, he was assured it was exactly the reverse, and that the conduct of the cadets was exemplary. In every particular—knowledge, conduct, and ability—the new system answered perfectly. A large number of those who entered Sandhurst had failed at Woolwich; and there was a remarkable instance of two young men who failed at Woolwich attaining the top of the list in the competitive examination for direct commissions. The present condition of the Royal Military Academy was on the whole satisfactory, although improvements might be made, and the expenditure was, perhaps, excessive. There were two staffs of military officers receiving high pay, with very little to do, and there were too many of the traditions maintained, of rules suited, perhaps, to school boys, but not suited for young men. He sincerely trusted there would be no tampering with the competitive system, which worked so well, for no movement could be more retrograde than an attempt to interfere with it.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he had been rather misunderstood. Speaking generally as to the competitive system he did not wish to say it had produced bad effects at Woolwich; on the contrary, as far as he had heard, he accepted the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the results at Woolwich were quite as good as they had been before its introduction.

Mr. Monsell

COLONEL NORTH, referring to a Committee appointed on his Motion many years ago, said, there was hardly a distinguished officer of the Royal Artillery and Engineers examined who did not express the opinion that the ages for admission into the Engineer and Artillery corps should be lowered, and that the educational test should be lowered also. The question was put whether the test now required from the officers was necessary for the daily performance of their duties, and the answer was that it was not. With regard to the entrance of officers into regiments of the Line, many of them began their duties as subalterns when they ought to be captains. He was delighted his noble Friend had succeeded in his object, because the state of Sandhurst College had been most extraordinary, boys of fourteen being in the same category with young men of seventeen and eighteen; and there must be great difficulty in framing rules suitable to these two classes. He hoped the Royal Commission would be able to take these points into consideration, and that some steps would be adopted by which such proceedings as his noble Friend had adverted to would no longer prevail.

MR. O'REILLY congratulated the noble Lord on his success, which rendered it unnecessary for him to detain the House with many observations. He wished, however, to draw two morals from the course of investigation which had been pursued on this subject. One was the great importance of perseverance. They were always told in making such a Motion that further inquiry was unnecessary, everything was already known, and it was idle, futile, to seek further inquiry. This subject had gone through these stages, just as that of recruiting had done. Another little moral related to the question how far the Government or the House of Commons were accountable for economy and efficiency in the expenditure of the country. It had been roundly stated that the House of Commons, having assented to the Estimates proposed by the Government, were fully as much accountable for the public expenditure as the Government who proposed them; and if there was anything to blame in the expenditure, it rested quite as much with the House of Commons as with the Government. He entirely dissented from the doctrine. It was impossible for the House of Commons in detail to enforce economy in the public expenditure. Even with regard to those military schools now to be inquired into by a Royal Commission, he had stated more than once that he believed the expenditure to be extravagant and unnecessary, and he undertook to demonstrate the fact. So long ago as 1862 he had called attention to what he believed to be the extravagant expense of the military schools of the country, founded on a comparison of Woolwich and Sandhurst with the Ecole Polytechnique and the Ecole Speciale Militaire, their correlatives; the expenditure at Woolwich being £160 per annum for each cadet, while in France it was only £115; and the teaching and superintendence, which in England was £85, cost in France only £40 each. At Sandhurst the expense of living was £70; at the Ecole Speciale Militaire, £50; while teaching and superintendence cost in England £70, and in France £34. The Secretary for War said inquiry was unnecessary; but next year he went a little farther, and ventured, having made careful inquiries throughout the country, and comparing the cost of teaching in military schools with the teaching in civil schools, to show that the teaching power in military schools everywhere was extravagant. The number of pupils at Woolwich was 180, and the number of teachers 35. There was great excess here, particularly in mathematics, there being not less than seven teachers in that department. Of course, they were met with the usual official stereotyped answers to such criticisms. The noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington), then Secretary of State for War, was not very able to answer; but the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) came to the rescue, and stated that the subject had been exhaustively considered by the Commission appointed in 1857, which had reported when he was Secretary of State. He attributed the ignorance which prevailed on this subject to the fact that the Library contained no copies of that Report, and the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington), as the result of that appeal, placed two copies in the Library. He devoted considerable time in reading that Report, and, strange to say, the Royal Commissioners corroborated most of the statements that had been made in that House, and made recommendations similar to those that had been suggested by hon. Members in the various debates that had taken place upon the subject. What steps, then, had been taken since 1857 to carry out that Report? With regard to the cost of education, this Commission reported that £100 per annum ought to cover the expense of a pupil at any military College. Did not that show that £160 was excessive? And so with regard to the teaching staff. The Commission reported that it was excessive. He then referred to the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for War, that the age of admission should be altered from sixteen to eighteen, to fifteen to seventeen, and observed that an earlier age should not be named for entering the College, but that they should diminish the time at which these cadets might reasonably hope for promotion. In conclusion, he said that it was futile to throw upon the House of Commons the responsibility of increased Estimates; the responsibility rested with the Government, which alone possessed the requisite knowledge of details.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, in reference to remarks from the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House, said, he certainly did not understand his right hon. Friend to propose a reference to the Committee of matters under the jurisdiction of the Crown.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK, referring to the late Sir George Wetherall, said, that officer seemed to have been placed at the head of Sandhurst, not because he was known to possess abilities as a teacher, but in order to reward him as a military man. But if it was intended to reward or honour a man it should be done directly, and not by placing him in a position for which he was not specially qualified. He found that Sandhurst cost £36,731 a year, and there were taught 300 cadets. He would ask any man accustomed to teaching, whether that was not a very large sum to pay. Again, Woolwich cost £38,581 for teaching 200 cadets. At Sandhurst, 300 cadets had 162 professors, teachers, and servants to look after them; and, at Woolwich, for 200 cadets, there were 149 professors, teachers, and servants to discharge similar duties. And yet it appeared from what had fallen from the noble Lord that these young men, notwithstanding all this looking after, were in the habit of going out to smoke, drink, and play billiards. The House could understand from that how it was that riots had occurred. One might expect that all these professors would be able to keep the young men in better order. There was one question which he wished to ask, and that was, whether those two institutions could not be put together and one large establishment formed, so that the expense of two sets of professors, instructors, teachers, and servants for 500 young men might be saved to the country?

GENERAL PERCY HERBERT wished to say a word with respect to the canteen established at Sandhurst, which had been referred to by the noble Lord. That canteen was opened for the purpose of supplying coffee, beer, and other things by way of luncheon and ordinary refreshment, but not spirits, to the cadets out of hours, and the object was to keep them from the temptation of the public-house. Billiard tables were established like racket-courts, with the view of giving the young men amusement and keeping them from low houses, where evil associates were likely to be picked up. He wished to express his satisfaction at the success of his noble Friend's Motion, and at the spirit in which the Secretary of State intended to meet it by recommending Her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission. The state of Sandhurst and Woolwich ever since he had any knowledge of them had been very unsatisfactory, and that was owing to a matter which had not been mentioned during the discussion. The fact was the young men were, for the most part, put four or five together into rooms; there was not much more moral supervision over them than over soldiers in a barrack; and they were not looked after in the way that boys were at Eton, Harrow, or any other of our public schools. That was a great defect. The professors, who were many of them very able men, when they had finished their lessons, had nothing further to do with the cadet; and, though the officers who were placed over them did undoubtedly look after the young men according to their view of their duty, and a natural view it was, yet the moral influence which was found so salutary, and which tutors exercised over boys at public schools, was wanting. Military men for the most part were not suited to be schoolmasters, because the business of the schoolmaster was one to which they had not been brought up; but, though absolutely necessary as teachers of technical matters, such as military history and fortification, he must give his candid opinion that, as far as the tone of moral conduct went, they made very bad schoolmasters. His noble Friend wanted to establish a University which every one who went into the army should be bound to enter. No doubt, there were arguments in favour of a higher professional education; but, while he was perfectly willing to see a University established where persons might go to take a degree in military science, he did not wish to force young men three or four years beforehand to make up their minds to enter the army. In his opinion they could not get better officers than were to be had from our public schools.

Mr. Alderman Lusk

MR. M. CHAMBERS pointed out that the inquiry which had been promised was of a small and limited nature, and expressed his regret that it was not to be larger and wider. Speaking from his experience at the military College of Sandhurst, he must express his opinion that the education of officers with respect to general attainments was now placed on too high a standard. That standard would not secure for the country, active, courageous, and able regimental officers in the general service. His dread was that many most excellent young men, most competent to be regimental officers, would be excluded from the army by reason of the competitive examination. At a former period men who could not at the present day have passed the competitive examination distinguished themselves in the Peninsular War, some of them attaining the highest rank, fighting well, proving excellent regimental officers, and maintaining in most difficult times the honour of the British flag. It was not alone a knowledge of mathematics, or of history, or of many other things he might mention, that was required by a military officer. On the contrary, he thought that a man might have his mind over-crammed with general knowledge, and be thereby less fitted for the performance of his duties than would otherwise be the case. He had himself been educated at Sandhurst, and much did he owe to the education he received there; but he remembered that at that time of day the students were taught how to load and manage a gun, but they were not allowed to use powder. Some time after that they were instructed in riding, which was doubtless a very necessary part of their training, but this was not done while he was in the school. The grand object should be to investigate the question as to what education was respectively required for regimental officers, for Engineer and Artillery officers, for staff officers and commanders of high rank; and nothing could be more mischievous than that a young man should, after a competitive examination, enter the army as an ensign or lieutenant, with the fancy that he knew better than everybody who happened to be above him. For his own part he thought it would be much better to unite the two establishments of Sandhurst and Woolwich. It should be understood that when this Commission was appointed, its duties should not be limited to a mere inquiry into what took place at the Colleges of Woolwich or Sandhurst; but that the whole system of army education, including competitive examinations and appointments to first and second commissions, should be thoroughly investigated, and the effect of the competitive examinations should be inquired into, so that the Commissioners might report for the consideration of the House whether they would continue the system of competitive examinations, which he granted might give them good officers, but which might exclude the very best of officers.

COLONEL SYKES referred to the experience of the East India Company, in connection with their great institution at Addiscombe, as illustrating how scientific education for the Engineers and Artillery might be combined with instruction for regimental positions. Addiscombe had sent out very many distinguished Artillery officers and Engineers to India, and among them was Sir Robert Napier, now commanding the army in Abyssinia, who went out very young. Some of the most distinguished Engineers that we had in India obtained their swords of merit by the time they were seventeen. He regretted to hear an hon. Gentleman complain that men went into the army too young. It was desirable that those who were intended for service in any country like India should go out at an early age, in order that they might get acclimatized, and might hold on. He himself had gone out at fourteen, he was under fire at fifteen, and he attributed his present advanced age and health to youthful acclimatization. He was glad to hear that the Commission was sanctioned, and if it were properly carried out, and due inquiry made as to the working of Addiscombe, he had no doubt that the result would be the combination of the two establishments at Woolwich and Sandhurst, not only with great efficiency, but also with great economy.

MR. ACLAND submitted that if there was one point more than another which required attention in connection with this question, it was the great secret of knowing how to teach. He earnestly hoped that the Government, in framing the terms of the Commission, would leave it open to the Commission to consider, and would almost direct their attention to, the question—how could the drill instructors of the English army be taught the art of teaching? If England meant to go on paying for auxiliary forces, 180,000 Volunteers, besides Yeomanry and Militia, it behoved the Secretary at War to consider whether the officers of some 300,000 or 400,000 men ought to be intrusted with the duty of teaching their brother civilians without, at least, having had an opportunity of going to some institution where they might be taught—first, the facts they ought to know; secondly, the principles on which those facts rested; and, lastly, how to impart them to civilians, who had very little time, and were not now properly taught by the drill instructors. Some of the instructors were very able, but they were only a very few amongst the many.

MR. WHALLEY said, he agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Devonport (Mr. Chambers) that under the present system the minds of officers were emasculated by over education. He hoped that the Commission to be appointed would include this subject in their inquiries—that they would consider why the two institutions alluded to were required at all, and on what grounds young men did not enter the army at as early an age as they entered the navy.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that a Royal Commission composed of Military and Civilian Members be appointed to inquire into the present state of Military Education in this Country, and more especially into the training of Candidates for Commissions in the Army, and into the constitution, system of Education, and discipline of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, as well as into the rules and regulations under which Candidates are admitted into those Colleges.—(Lord Eustace Cecil.)

EAST INDIA CIVIL SERVICE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. FAWCETT, in rising to move a Resolution relative to Examinations for the East India Civil Service, said, that Her Majesty, in her Proclamation to the People of India in 1858, which had been looked upon as the charter of their liberties, declared it to be her will and pleasure that all her subjects, of whatever race or creed, should be fairly and impartially admitted into her service, if they were qualified by education, ability, and integrity. He should be able to prove that if some scheme like that he intended to propose was not carried out that promise would not be faithfully fulfilled. Under the present system of admission to the Civil Service, a preliminary examination was necessary in London, to decide on the candidate's intellectual and moral fitness; and on succeeding in this he was required to spend two years in this country, taking minutes of the proceedings of Courts of Justice, and in other ways preparing himself for his duties. It was no doubt true that the Natives of India might compete in these examinations; but, as they could only do so by coming to London, at great expense, and then might be unsuccessful, to say that the examinations were practically open to them was an idle mockery. In fact, though the system had continued for many years, only one Native had entered into the competition. His proposal was that there should be examinations at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay; that there should be the same papers and the same tests as in London; and that the successful candidates, whether English or Native, should spend two years in this country. To this he had reason to believe, from memorials he had received from Calcutta and Bombay, the Natives would not object, though they naturally objected to coming over to England in the first instance without any guarantee of success. Their two years' residence here might be turned to good account; for conversation with many of the leading members of his own University enabled him to say that at Cambridge, as also, doubtless at Oxford, they would be welcomed and encouraged to spend the two years there, and they would thus be brought in contact with the best of our English youth. There would be no difficulty in carrying out this plan; for the examination papers might be sent under seal to India, and, the examination being fixed for the same day as in London, the candidates' papers might be sent home under seal, and inspected by the same examiners, the names of the successful candidates at all four examinations being arranged in the order of merit. This would be analogous to the plan pursued with the Middle Class Examinations, Cambridge University having a centre at Trinidad, and the examination there being conducted as fairly as at London or Liverpool. An objection might, indeed, be taken on account of part of the examinations being viva voce, but some of the best scholars from English Universities held professorships in India, and were perfectly competent to conduct viva voce examinations. The Secretary for India, while not resisting the claim of the Natives to a larger share in the government of the country, preferred a compromise, which was embodied in an Amendment to be moved by his hon. Friend (Mr. Trevelyan)—namely, that a certain proportion of the appointments should be reserved for Natives who were properly qualified. The plan, however, unless the proportion were absolutely fixed, would vary with the changing opinions of each Governor General or Secretary of State, and it would not satisfy the just demands of the people of India. Even in the Uncovenanted Service there was only one Native. Some favoured the plan of permitting a given proportion of the Civil Service to consist of Natives; but if it were decided that one-third or one-fifth should be Native, it might happen that the quota could not be supplied in consequence of the inefficiency of the candidates. But under any circumstances the admission of Natives on the present terms would be very trying to them, because they would always occupy an inferior position; for Englishmen, who were prone to feel proud of their race, would say to the Natives that had they been obliged to undergo the same test that they as Englishmen had been subjected to, they never would have been admitted to the Civil Service, and they would therefore take care to keep the Native civil servants always down. The people of India were ready to undergo whatever intellectual test it was deemed wise to impose; all they asked for was to be subjected to precisely the same trial as the English. He had seen letters from Natives of India stating that, if they could only obtain this privilege of perfect equality, and the result should show that not one Native could prove himself equal to his English competitor, they would then have no longer any ground for complaint. He made no prediction as to the number of Natives that would be successful in the examinations; but he believed that it would be an intellectual rivalry which would benefit the people of England as well as of India. He felt confident, however, that a large number of Natives would be successful ; and he based his confidence on the fact that they were a studious people and showed an extraordinary zeal for a high education. Intellectually, he was convinced the Natives were not inferior to the English. A very eminent friend of his, who had been twelve years tutor at Cambridge, and who had also been tutor at Calcutta, said that he never had another class for high intellectual character such as he had at Calcutta. The Secretary for India might say that something beside intellect was needed, and insist upon moral qualities as well. He answered that moral qualities should also be insisted on when Englishmen were chosen to assist in the government of those whom they looked upon as a subject race. Sir Bartle Frere had said that those Natives who had received a good education were always foremost in their advocacy of the Imperial Government. He (Mr. Fawcett) saw no objection, however, to requiring that Native candidates should pass two years in some recognized English educational establishment where their moral character might be studied. It should be said, in defence of the Natives, that to make them fill inferior offices at a mean rate of pay was not the way to cultivate integrity among them. Even a Native Judge who had power to decide cases involving sums up to £500 received no more than one-fifth of the lowest European Judge in India. Sir Thomas Munro had testified to the assiduity of the Natives ; he had spoken of them as better men of business than Europeans, and more fitted to fill offices under Government, because they were acquainted with the manners and customs of the people ; and, with reference to their alleged inferiority of character, he had asked, what would be the effect on English character if we, having been subjected, were debarred from all but the meanest Offices of State ? our civilization and our literature would be destroyed, nothing would save us from debasement. It was an indisputable fact that many Natives competent to govern a province were fulfilling the humblest duties at salaries less than was received by the youngest member of the Indian Civil Service. Lord Metcalfe had well said that the bane of our system was that the advantages were reaped by one class and the work was done by another. The great reason why the people of India were not more contented with our rule was, not that we had not given them material prosperity, but that we had excluded them from social, municipal, and political offices. The great defect of our Indian system had been its rigid centralization. It was obvious that those who had been brought up upon the spot must be better able to understand the wants of the people, to enter into their feelings, and to appreciate their prejudices, than those who were completely strangers to them. Sir Bartle Frere, in one of his despatches, said he had been much struck with the fact that the ablest exponents of English policy, and our best coadjutors in adapting that policy to the wants of the various nations occupying Indian soil, were to be found among the Natives who had received a high-class English education. It was too often forgotten in that House that India was really not one nation, but it was composed of many nations, and therefore a system of strict centralization was peculiarly ill-adapted to that country. What was particularly wanted in India was that that there should be in the public service persons who understood the particular manners, customs, and prejudices of the varied and distinct nations of which it was composed. By carrying out the proposal embodied in his Resolution they would redress the grievance complained of, inasmuch as they would throw open the appointments in the public service in that country to all those Natives who were intellectually and morally qualified to fill them. Directly they educated a man they made him ambitious to take part in the government of the country, and, therefore, it became more hard each day on the people of India to quench the ambition which by these educational efforts we had called forth. It was very hard, again, that the children of English officers or civilians resident in India should not have the same facilities for obtaining admission to service under the Crown as were possessed by the families of officers or civilians resident in England. This consideration would become of even greater importance if, with increased facilities for locomotion, and with means of sending children to the hills every year, it became possible to rear the families of Europeans in India itself. The course which he advocated was based upon justice ; and he was perfectly certain, that if adopted, it would have a most beneficial effect upon public opinion throughout our Indian territory. It had been well said of the subjects of Her Majesty's Eastern Empire—that in their prosperity was our strength, in their contentment our security, and their gratitude would be our best reward. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

Mr. Fawcett

MR. M'LAREN seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House, whilst cordially approving of the system of open competition for appointments in the East India Civil Service, is of opinion that the people of India have not a fair chance of competing for these appointments as long as the examinations are held nowhere but in London; this House would therefore deem it desirable that, simultaneously with the examination in London, the same examination should be held in Calcutta, Bombay and Madras."—(Mr. Fawcett.)

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I gather from the speech of my hon. Friend, with the spirit of which I cordially agree, that he has two principal objects in bringing forward this Resolution. First, he wishes, by placing the Natives of India in intellectual competition with our own countrymen, to vindicate their claims to mental superiority, and thereby to diminish the tone of disparagement and contempt which is too often adopted with regard to them; and, secondly, he aims at giving them a fair share in the administration of their own country. Now, Sir, if the House will lend me its attention, and I promise not to detain it long, I hope to be able to show that the first of these objects, so far from being furthered by the course which my hon. Friend calls on you to adopt, will, on the contrary, suffer from it a great and, what is more, an irremediable check; and that the second will be attained in a much more sure and satisfactory manner, by the course indicated in the Amendment which I have placed upon the Paper, and which the Government has since embodied in a Bill: a Bill to which, as a humble but sincere well-wisher to India, I beg to give my cordial approval. Sir, I deplore equally with my hon. Friend, the manner in which European settlers and planters, and, in too many cases, the younger officers of our army allow themselves to speak of their Indian fellow-subjects. As a proof of sincerity on this point, hon. Gentlemen will perhaps not think it impertinent in me to state that I once wrote a book, whose only merit consisted in its being a protest against the high-handed, overbearing, and unjust way in which many Englishmen spoke of and dealt with the population whom it was their special national mission to govern and to elevate; a protest which called down on me the vigorous denunciations of the Anglo-Indian Press. But, Sir, the policy of my hon. Friend, instead of extinguishing those feelings of dislike and depreciation would only serve to embitter and perpetuate them; and the process by which this unfortunate result would come about is obvious and certain. What is this Covenanted Civil Service? What is its special object, and what is the public reason for its existence? It is the appointed channel through which the knowledge, the ability, the higher morality of the United Kingdom is applied to the administration of India, and not of the United Kingdom only, but of Canada, Australia, and the other British colonies. In order to ascertain who are the best and ablest among our young men, we hold yearly a searching competitive examination; and, in order to attract the greatest possible number of such young men, we hold out to the successful candidates the certainty of a highly paid and most influential, and interesting public career. To bring to bear upon India the highest governing powers of the United Kingdom and the whole British Empire, is, therefore, the object of the Covenanted Civil Service, and the justification for its existence. And hon. Gentlemen must remember that it needs such a justification, for this Civil Service is guarded by monopoly, and fenced round with privileges. It is exclusive to such a degree, that the Government are bound to continue in their service, and to promote according to the ordinary routine, every civil servant who is sent out under covenant, unless he commits some act of gross misconduct; and they are also restrained from looking abroad for persons of experience and ability, and are bound to confine themselves to members of this privileged class, unless circumstances should occur of such a special and exceptional character, that practically they never have occurred, and the monopoly of the Covenanted Civil Service remains to this day unfringed and absolute. The civil servants sent out to India are untried young men, and, owing to moral and physical defects which cannot be absolutely tested in an examination, a proportion of them are certain to turn out unfit for the highly difficult and important administrative career to which they have been designated; and yet the conditions on which they entered the service must be observed. The Government must fulfill its side of the contract. Good or bad they must be promoted in their turn, or in something like their turn. Posts worth their acceptance have to be found for them. Men are made Judges who are notoriously deficient in discrimination, and are appointed to govern provinces as large as an English county, though they have never learned to govern themselves. And yet, for the honour of our nation, it must be said that the number of bad bargains is surprisingly small; and the reason is evident. Success in the competitive examination is a guarantee that an English civil servant possesses industry, and intellectual ability, and an Englishman who is industrious and clever is very seldom deficient in the moral qualities of force, energy, honesty, and courage; qualities which are absolutely essential to all who aspire to be enrolled among the governing caste of an Oriental people. But it is far otherwise with Hindoos. The Natives of Bengal are remarkable for extreme quickness and cleverness; but, as compared with Europeans, are singularly deficient in the bolder and hardier virtues—in pluck, self-reliance, and veracity—the three great national attributes by which we gained, and by which we retain our hold upon British India. In such a competition as is proposed by my hon. Friend, they would be eminently successful; for remarkable as is their capacity, it is not so peculiar as the premature ripeness of their intellect. Their turn for mathematics is extraordinary. A Cambridge contemporary of my own, who was professor at the Calcutta University, a distinguished wrangler, assured me that the young men whom he was engaged in instructing, rushed through his course of subjects at such headlong speed that he began to be afraid lest, at the end of six months, he should have nothing left to teach them. There is no doubt that if you adopt my hon. Friend's Resolution; if you open these doors at Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay, the Natives would come in by shoals, and just reflect a moment on what you will be doing. The Hindoos are strong in intellect, and confessedly weak in morale. You submit them to an intellectual test, which the great number are pretty sure to pass. You dispense with the moral test, by which the great number are pretty sure to fail. You will have the service full of bad bargains. And why? Why, Sir, because in old Haileybury days, when the service was close, and there was no competitive test, a bad bargain meant a man who was a fool. In these days, when there is a competitive test, when every successful candidate must have, at the least, some book learning, a bad bargain means a man who is a muff.

Mr. Fawcett

And, Sir, if 5 per cent of the English competition wallahs are found wanting in the vigorous and manly virtues, indispensable to the members of a ruling caste, what will be the percentage among the Hindoo competition wallahs? Why, many times as great, Sir; and everyone, who thinks for a moment, will see that it must be so, and no one more clearly than the hon. Gentleman, who, in discussions of this nature, has the immense, and almost unique advantage of being equally versed in practical education and practical politics. Of course, where you find one young English civil servant unequal to the duties and responsibilities of his career, you will find ten or twenty Natives; for the very plain reason that we, as a race, are far superior to them in force of character. We know that it is so by observation; by their own confession; by the overwhelming testimony of fact. If it be not the case—if the average of what I may call the governing qualities is as high among the Hindoos as among the English, how did we ever get to India, and how do we contrive to stay there? We are there because nine Englishmen out of ten are born to rule, and ninety-nine out of 100 Hindoos are born to be governed; because we are manly, and they are effeminate; because—but instead of giving reasons to ourselves why we are in India an Imperial race, ask the first Native, and what is he sure to tell you? He is sure to say—and I appeal for confirmation to every old civil servant in the House—that the secret of our power in India is not so much our valour, not so much our enterprize, as that we, as a nation, speak the truth, and never take bribes. And, therefore, Sir, if, in an evil day for our rule in India, you listen to the advice of my hon. Friend, you will fill the service with men who will succeed in the examination, and altogether break down in practical life. The Indian career is of such a nature that the youngest civilian has constant demands upon his stock of determination and self-reliance. Contingencies are frequently occurring when he is looked to to put down a dangerous outbreak; to coerce or cajole a refractory potentate; to arbitrate between religious sects inflamed against each other by mutual injuries. On such an occasion the great majority of these unhappy Hindoo competition wallahs would succumb to the difficulties of their situation, and then what would become of the philanthropic motives of my hon. Friend? Would this be a state of the case likely to induce English planters and subalterns to moderate their tone towards the Natives of India? No, Sir! On the contrary, they would imagine that everything harsh and unkind which they were accustomed to say and believe had received an additional justification. Their taunts and sarcasm would acquire fresh point, and they would believe that they had now good ground to upbraid the Hindoos for inferiority of character, whereas, up to that time, they had only abused them on speculation.

But, Sir, if we reject the proposition of my hon. Friend we are bound in honour as a nation to substitute for it some machinery by which Native Indian talent may be brought to bear upon the administration of India. I say, in honour as a nation, because in the 87th section of the Charter Act of 1833 we solemnly pledged ourselves to open all employments to Natives, without distinction of caste, sect, or religion. And how have we redeemed this pledge? We have extended the line somewhat as regards the subordinate class of employments to which Natives are eligible. If this had not been done the business of the country could not have been carried on, and public affairs must have fallen into utter confusion; and, at the same time, we have appointed Natives to the honorary unpaid situation of Legislative Councillor, and to a very small number of Judgeships of the High Courts—two or three for the whole of India. But as regards the great bulk of judicial revenue and other offices the monopoly of the Covenanted Service has not only been practically maintained, but has been confirmed, and has had a new legal sanction given to it by the Civil Service Act of 1861, whereby all the situations previously held by the Civil Service have been scheduled and declared to be tenable only by members of that Service, as well as all similar offices which may be created hereafter. That is the manner in which we fulfil our solemn national engagements. We ordain that the entire people of a great country, who from time immemorial had governed themselves, and managed their own affairs, should be entirely excluded from their own administration, except as regards those subordinate offices which could not be filled by members of the Covenanted Civil Service, without involving intolerable expense and certain inefficiency, and a very small number of high situations most of which were unpaid. And hon. Members must observe that, by declaring the Natives eligible for the high situations of Legislative Councillor and Judge of the High Court, we have admitted their fitness for the large class of situations which lie between the Judgeships of the High Court and the principal Sudder Ameenships and other subordinate posts which they are permitted to fill; and yet we take no steps to give practical effect to this inevitable inference. We ignore this fact; and give another proof, if another proof were wanted, that injustice always involves inconsistency. This injustice must be redressed; and the means of redressing it are fortunately at hand. In every Presidency there are two, three, or four Natives of tried character, ability, and official experience. These men are well known to the authorities of the district in which they reside, and the authorities would gladly employ them in the most elevated and responsible situations if the law did not place an obstacle in the way. In the Regulation Provinces—that is to say, speaking roughly, in three-fourths of British India, all the Governor General can do for Natives who have earned their promotion is to refer them back to the competitive entrance examination. What mockery this is! I appeal to those hon. Gentlemen opposite, who do not love the modern system of competition, to put off men who have earned an honourable public reputation, by twenty or thirty years' practical service, by directing their attention to a competitive examination in English poetry and pure mathematics, held in a class room 6,000 miles across the sea. There are plenty of Natives, Sir, fit for any public employment, however weighty and dignified. I need not remind the House of the names of those great ministers of Native Powers—Sarlur Jung, Madhava Rao, Dinker Rao, and Jung Bahadoor, the famous Mayor of the Palace of Nepaul. And just as all the Indian world knows the fame of these eminent men, so the public opinion of every province can point to Natives intellectually and morally not one whit inferior to the best among our own countrymen. In Madras, for instance, when there was a question of a complicated operation connected with the annual assessment, it was universally allowed that, throughout the whole Covenanted and Uncovenanted Service, there was no one so fitted for the job as a Native employée called Ramiah. And how was this man rewarded? The Government gave him the best post they legally could: that is to say, they made him a sort of subordinate adviser to the Revenue authorities of the Presidency. Now, would the position of such a man be bettered by my hon. Friend's proposition? When you have such a man ready to hand it is a farce to examine him in geology, and to ask him what play the quotation "When Greek meets Greek" comes from. The evils which the system of competition is intended to remedy are two. First, the ignorance of those who are possessed of patronage, as to the merits of the candidates for that patronage; and next, the tendency in all human beings to nepotism and favouritism. But in the case before us neither of these dangers exists. The resident authorities who have the patronage are well informed as to the merits and services of their Native subordinates; and there is no temptation to jobbery, for in the eyes of an Englishman, as far as favouritism is concerned, one Native is much the same as another. And therefore, Sir, the House might safely adopt my Amendment, which could be carried into practical effect by the least possible degree of change in the law. The 3rd and 4th clauses of the Civil Service Act allow the Authority in India to appoint any person to any office whatsoever, under special circumstances; provided he has resided at least seven years in India. Now, all that is really required is, that the provisions of these sections should be relieved from their exceptional character; and that it should be declared, on the authority of this House, that the selection for vacant appointments of qualified persons on the spot is to be considered as regular and normal a mode of recruiting the Civil Service, as nominating young men to it from this country according to the result of a competitive examination. Thus we should have two permanent sources of supply for the India Civil Service: one would be derived, as at present, from the competition at home of the youth of the whole Empire; the other, from a careful selection made in India itself of persons distinguished in the Uncovenanted Service and at the Native Bar. We should take a signal step towards raising the character and educating the intellect of the Natives, and so gradually rendering them fit to govern themselves. And for what other purpose are we in India at all? No purpose, at any rate, which we can confess before Europe and before the tribunal of history. We should imitate what was wisest in the policy of old Rome, as expressed by Gibbon in a most eloquent passage. But we need not go so far back, nor to such a distance from the country whose future we are discussing. There are examples nearer India. Akbar, the greatest of the great Mahomedan Emperors, opened the field of employment and distinction, in the most liberal manner to Hindoos—the conquered and subject race; and his fame and power were equally brilliant and durable. Aurengzebe pursued a different course. He sent orders to all governors and persons in authority to employ no more Hindoos, but to confer the higher offices on Mahomedans only: and from that day the Mogul Empire began to go to pieces, as must be the fate of all empires which rest on force, not on affection; on national monopoly of rule and honour, not on open and entire confidence between the governors and the governed. He would beg leave to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Trevelyan

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words "open competition" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "as regards the appointment of untried young men to the East India Civil Service, is of opinion that natives of India who have proved in the Uncovenanted Service or otherwise their superior fitness for situations at present held exclusively by Members in the Covenanted Service should be appointed to them without undergoing a competing examination,"—(Mr. Trevelyan,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

COLONEL SYKES said, that annually a number of Native young men of the highest intellectual and mental calibre took degrees in India by passing similar examinations to those which were necessary to the conferring of the same degrees in this country. And yet men who exhibited such capacity and attained those degrees were excluded from the Civil Service of India unless they passed examinations in this country which were by no means so hard as those they had already gone through. This was the practice, in spite of the fact that the Vote for the Education of the Natives of India amounted to £904,190, or more than was at present expended in the same direction on the people of this country. He certainly thought that those Natives who obtained such degrees as those of B.A., M.A., and M.D. ought to be permitted at once to enter the Civil Service and not be compelled to come to England for the purpose of undergoing a fresh examination. Certainly it would be advantageous to Indian aspirants to pass some time in England, as it would enlarge their views and give an improved tone to their minds, and young Indians might be induced to come to Europe if scholarships should be established in this country for those who looked to rise in the service of the Government. These scholarships would enable young Indians to obtain advantages which they could not procure in their native country. The support which we received from the Nepaulese troops in the suppression of the mutiny in 1857, we owed to the visit which Jung Bahadoor had paid to England. He (Colonel Sykes) was enabled to learn, from his friendship with Jung Bahadoor, that when the Bengal mutiny broke out, delegates were sent by the mutineers to the Nepaul Court inviting co-operation against the English. A great meeting of the Court nobles and chiefs of the army was held, and the general sentiment was in favour of joining the mutineers; but Jung Bahadoor rose and said he too would have concurred in the opinions expressed, had he not paid a visit to England; but he saw there such industry, such energy, and such indomitable perseverance in conquering difficulties, that although the mutineers might at first succeed and drive the English to the coast, they would be involved in the end in defeat and ruin. Happily his advice prevailed, and the Nepaulese army joined the English, and Jung Bahadoor's prediction was verified. On the whole, therefore, he (Colonel Sykes) would encourage Natives to finish their studies in England.

MR. FAWCETT explained that it was part of his scheme that successful competitors should reside two years in England.

COLONEL SYKES said, he was also opposed to the Amendment, believing that it would be worse than of no service to the Natives; but he believed the time was arriving, and educated people were accumulating so fast in India, and the self-respect and importance of the Native population were extending so rapidly, that some suitable and dignified positions must be obtained for them in our service, in order to ensure their attachment, instead of exciting their jealousy and resentment.

MR. NEATE said, that having for two years been brought, in his capacity of Examiner, into contact with the candidates for the Indian Civil Service, he wished to make some brief remarks on the subject before the House. The question of competitive examinations was indirectly raised by the Motion of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett), and he was obliged to confess that his experience led him to doubt very much the efficiency of that system, and to doubt whether it was better than the old system of patronage. It was far from a good method of providing for the Civil Service of India. He had had a good deal to do with the people of India; and the feeling among them undoubtedly was that the class of men now sent out to represent this country were inferior to the men sent out under the old system, and could not acquire in the same degree the respect of the Natives. The civil servants were now degenerating into a lower class of society, and there was rising up in the different Presidencies a new class of independent Englishmen, especially at the Bar, who looked down on the Civil Service. His hon. Friend the Member for Brighton had said that he intended by his Motion to provide that those who were appointed to the Civil Service by the competition by examination in Calcutta should reside two years in England. If the Motion expressed that, he should view it in a different light—not on the ground put forward by his hon. Friend who sat near him (Mr. Trevelyan), that the candidates would be more impressed with the irresistible power of this country, but because they would have learnt the principles and morality of this country. As to the mere question of learning, however, it might happen that the English competitors would be placed at a disadvantage as compared with young Indians of the same age, who, though less fit to discharge the responsible duties imposed upon them, would have greater facilities for preparing themselves for an examination. If he were to choose between the Motion and the Amendment, he should prefer the latter; because it was based on the principle that our great object was not so much to secure men who were able to pass a good examination in languages and mathematics as men imbued with the spirit and tone of this country.

Colonel Sykes

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it was not without some regret that he felt himself obliged to oppose the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, for in the object aimed at he was disposed to agree very much with the hon. Gentleman, as he naturally desired to promote, as far as possible, the employment of Natives of India in the Civil Service and government of that country. He was conscious that the offer now made to the Natives of India—that they should present themselves at the competitive examinations in this country—was at all events at present little more than a nominal opening for Natives, though he hoped, that by-and-by, it would become something more. At present, however, it was only with great difficulty that Natives could pass such an examination. Although he was unable to accept the proposal of the hon. Member for Brighton, he should be extremely glad to adopt a system by which competition might be adopted in the first cities of India. This matter was brought under his attention some time ago by a deputation which waited upon him—he believed in July or August last—at the India Office. He listened to their statements, and promised to consult the Governor General and other persons of authority on the subject. He did so, and one or two objections of a subordinate character had been suggested, such as the difficulties of a mechanical kind as to the mode of carrying the examination into effect; but he believed, from representations he had had from the Civil Service Examiners, that those objections might be very readily got over. He believed that examinations upon paper might be conducted in the way suggested by the hon. Gentleman; but with regard to vidæ voce examinations, it would be difficult to find a proper standard of comparison. The difficulty would be to compare the vidæ voce examinations conducted in one place with those conducted in another. He attached great weight to these vidæ voce examinations, as they showed that the candidate was able to make use of the knowledge he had acquired on the spur of the moment, when unexpected questions were put to him. Another objection to the proposal would be that the examinations should be held in many more centres than the two or three suggested by the hon. Member, if they were intended to be accessible to certain classes of the Natives. A further objection that might be suggested was, that if the proposal were adopted, it might at some future period be urged that the nature of the examination was of a character not suitable to the people of India, and considerable pressure might be brought to bear for the purpose of getting the standard of examination altered, under the pretence of adapting it to the capabilities of the Natives—an alteration that would be much to be lamented, as the service as now constituted was one of which England had every right to be proud. The hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Mr. Neate) had made some observations upon what he called the deterioration of the Civil Service in India under the system of competitive examinations; but it was doubtful whether, upon a full and impartial inquiry, any grounds existed for that complaint. It was quite true that when a change of system occurred, the minds of the Natives were prejudiced against those who were appointed under the new system, and were disposed to look jealously upon them; but, from recent information, he had reason to believe that that feeling on the part of the Natives had passed away, and that the merits of the new comers as a body had been acknowledged by them. The present system was still going on, and those appointed under the competitive examination system had scarcely yet risen to the higher posts in the Service; but, within his own knowledge, two of those gentlemen who were now in this country, and who were among the first of those who were appointed under that system, were as promising and as distinguished young men as were to be found in the service of the country. On the whole, he had reason to believe that the system answered exceedingly well, and was likely to prove of the greatest advantage to the service. Another danger he should apprehend from the adoption of the hon. Member's proposal was this:—It was not improbable that a large number of Natives who might succeed in passing the competitive examination, and who might be perfectly fit for the lower posts of the service, would be totally unfit for its higher and more responsible posts, and the Government of India might hold it contrary to their duty to promote those persons to those positions—a course that would be likely to promote jealousy and heart-burnings among the Natives, who might consider that they were not fairly treated by being excluded from the more important positions in the service. In such an event the Government of India would probably feel called upon to obtain the required strength of will and of mind by having recourse to the Uncovenanted European Civil Service, instead of to the Covenanted Civil Service. He was exceedingly jealous of the Uncovenanted Service being employed in posts that should be filled by the Covenanted Service; because although there were, doubtless, many posts that might with propriety be bestowed upon those who had not passed through the test of competitive examination, still there should be great jealousy in admitting persons into the service through any other door than that furnished by examination, otherwise considerable pressure would be brought to bear upon those who had the patronage of those appointments. Every one conversant with the subject must feel that the great safety of the service in India lay in recruiting as far as possible the European branch of the service from the Covenanted Service. These were the reasons which induced him to pause and hesitate before he could sanction any such proposal as that suggested by the hon. Gentleman; and these reasons were confirmed by the views of those who were well qualified to speak upon the subject, being those who were practically engaged in carrying on the Government of India—men who were favourable to the employment of Natives in India, whose sympathies were in their favour, and who were desirous of making the Native Indian our friend—and they were of opinion that the adoption of the proposal of the hon. Member would be a measure fraught with much inconvenience and even serious danger. He wished to say a few words upon what appeared to him to be the rationale of the competitive examination system. He had always been an advocate for that system as a mode of obtaining young men for the Civil Service both for this country and for India. While that system did not necessarily secure that all those who passed through the examination were the fittest for discharging the duties of Government clerks and those which fell upon our civil servants, still upon the whole it was the fairest way of ascertaining, who among a large number of young men, had established, by their previous good conduct and application, a character for industry and ability, which was strong evidence to show that at least they formed a fair average of the class from which they were taken. But then the question arose, whether the average of the class of Native Indians from which the selection would have to be made was possessed of the necessary ruling and governing qualities to the extent those qualities were possessed by the corresponding class in this country—whether the Native Indians were possessed of the fibre required in men who were to be intrusted with political power and authority? It must be borne in mind that these men were selected to fill very important posts. They might be well fitted to fill the lower posts, but those who filled the higher posts of the service were frequently placed in situations where great responsibility fell upon them, and where men were required who were not only truly trustworthy as to integrity, but who in trying positions would not be afraid to act, and who could stand alone. They must have the vigour to control those who were under their authority, whether of the same race or another, because there would always be a considerable number of Englishmen and Europeans with whom superior officials would have to deal. Without casting any reflection upon the Native character as a whole, he much doubted whether an average Native was able to stand alone and to control the Englishmen under his jurisdiction. Therefore the competitive system, applied in an unfettered way, was not suitable for providing the class of men wanted. He was afraid the effect of it would be to bring in a large number of individuals of intellectual ability who would not have the strength required for administration. It was urged that we should do all we could to benefit the people of India. Everybody admitted that; but who were the people of India, and for whose benefit were we to rule? If they adopted the theory of the hon. Member for Brighton, it would only be that class or section of the people of India who would carry off these appointments—a very small section of the community. It should be carefully remembered that we had to provide for the government of 150,000,000 of people, amongst whom only a small class could be described as intellectual. Our duty, therefore, primarily was to provide the best possible machinery for the good government of the whole mass, rather than for a small portion. Even were the system of competitive examination advocated by the hon. Member introduced, what would be the result? The Bengalese and other sects of the less vigorous but more educated races of India would be the class chiefly benefited. They would carry off the prizes in an examination of a purely intellectual character; but they were just the men who would conspicuously fail if you placed them in positions of difficulty, or set them to rule over the more vigorous races that we had under our sway. They would be employed without the advantages of Englishmen, without the prestige of the English race, and without the energy of the English character; and we could not rely upon their being treated with that esteem which in the East is attached to persons distinguished by birth and family connection. Under these circumstances, we ought to be cautious how we throw open the door by competitive examinations. This opinion was coincided in by many of those most favourable to the employment of Natives, including Sir John Lawrence, Sir Bartle Frere, and Sir Herbert Edwards; and the latter, in a paper lately read before the East India Association, spoke with great hesitation as to the morale and integrity of the great mass of the people of India. Attached to the pamphlet in which this was published were a number of letters, all purporting to be in favour of the employment of Natives; but there was scarcely one writer who boldly stated his opinion that the Natives, as a class, were to be relied on for the moral qualities required in rulers. He was afraid that any kind of test that could be applied in the shape of testimonials and inquiries as to character would be feeble security. Another reason for pausing was, that if once they entered into the system, they would be obliged to go on with it, no matter what might be the difficulties into which it might throw them. He would not close the door for ever against examinations; but there were other measures more suitable to the emergency which would do much towards introducing Natives freely. The first was that of scholarships; and if young men could be assisted to present themselves for examination in this country, and to receive a certain education here, much would be done to imbue them with English feelings; and even if they failed on examination, they would not have had their time thrown away, because they would have learnt much that would be useful to them. There was every disposition on the part of the Government to assist those who gained scholarships, and it was proposed to pay their passages out and home. It was suggested that, if the system succeeded, further scholarships might be created by the Government; and, by degrees, young men might be brought over and passed through the mill with competitors upon equal terms. This would provide a test of moral qualities, for it would show courage, vigour, and self-reliance for a young man to expatriate himself, and it would indicate that he was above the average in moral strength and fibre. There was another measure substantially the same as that embodied in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trevelyan), who, however, did not draw a sufficiently sharp distinction between the Covenanted and Uncovenanted Civil Service. That distinction was a matter of great importance. At present there were about 870 covenanted civil servants in India, with salaries ranging from about £360 to upwards of £5,000, few having more than that. The Uncovenanted servants, leaving the lowest appointments out of consideration, and including those whose salaries ranged from £250 to £1,000 and £1,500 (a few reaching £2,000), numbered 2,336. The average of the salaries of the Covenanted servants was £1,800, and that of the Uncovenanted servants £520. [Colonel SYKES remarked that Europeans held the highest paid positions.] Not exclusively, for there were fifteen Natives receiving salaries of upwards of £1,000, and several receiving upwards of £500. Unquestionably the number of Natives admitted into the Service was miserably small, and that the Government was endeavouring to remedy as soon as possible. Last year he had drawn the attention of the Governor General to the fact in a despatch, and had asked his opinion as to the possibility of finding a better opening for the employment of Native talent. The Governor General replied that steps were being taken to introduce a larger proportion of Natives in the non-Regulation Provinces. To that he replied it would not be necessary to confine the measure to the non-Regulation Provinces, but that it should likewise be carried out in the Regulation Provinces. With regard to the judicial service, Sir John Lawrence thought that, while it might be dangerous to throw it open widely to Natives, much might be done to employ Natives in it. His intention was to insert in his India Bill a clause giving the Government power to introduce Natives of India into appointments held by the Covenanted Service, if they were proved fit for them; and that would be a better mode of selection than the system of competitive examinations. At all events, it would be safe; and if it proved inefficient they might resort to other measures in order to give it extension. It was the earnest and sincere desire of the Government both here and in India to introduce the Natives into important positions in the service. It would be for the benefit of our rule, it would be of importance for India itself, that the Natives should be educated to govern themselves and their own affairs. They believed that an immense improvement was going on among the Natives, and would be gradually productive of beneficial change; but it was most important that nothing rash or hasty should be done. He believed that the step taken would give considerable impulse to that improvement, and to the real interests of Native agency, far beyond anything that had hitherto been done. He hoped, therefore, that having introduced a clause to give effect to the principle of the Amendment, it would not be thought necessary to press either the Motion or the Amendment to a division in order to commit the House to any positive view. He was very glad this discussion had taken place. They were taking action on the subject both in their correspondence with India, and in the measure they were submitting to Parliament, and he hoped the feeling of the House had been sufficiently manifested without taking a division.

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. FAWCETT said, that after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he would not divide the House on his Motion. The right hon. Gentleman did not seem to impugn his Motion, but simply wished to try something else first. He should be doing an injustice to the question by now dividing, and he would have the opportunity of expressing his opinion when the Bill to which the Secretary of State for India had referred was before the House. He should support a scheme to enable the Natives to take a part in the government of their country. The Amendment, indeed, was not antagonistic to his proposal. It was simply to enable officers to pass from the Uncovenanted to the Covenanted service without coming to England to pass an examination. At the same time he thought that the people of India would not be satisfied at their being obliged to spend so many years in the Uncovenanted Service before they could enter the Covenanted, when, if they came to England and passed the examination, they could enter at once. All that the proposition of the Government meant was to admit persons that the Governor General thought fit to enter the Covenanted Service, and he thought that that would not be quite satisfactory to the people of India.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (METROPOLIS) BILL.—LEAVE.

MR. J. STUART MILL, in moving for leave to introduce two Bills, one for the purpose of providing for the establishment of Municipal Corporations in the Metropolis, and the other for the creation of a Corporation of London, observed that both were substantially the same as those which the House permitted him last year to lay on the table. The alterations were extremely slight. He was quite aware that no private Member could expect to carry through such measures. In order that they might succeed Government must take them up; but the Government had not shown any disposition to take up the subject, and in the present year, considering all the circumstances of the case, he could not blame them. No Government was likely to embarrass itself with such a subject until much discussion had taken place, and public opinion had been called forth to give them a sufficient degree of support. The introduction of the Bills had already produced considerable effect. This was shown by the number of petitions, which were almost all in favour of the Bills. The opposition to the Bills had chiefly proceeded from persons connected with the present local administrative bodies, who were not likely to be wholly unprejudiced on the subject of their own mode of administration. The passing of the Reform Bill last Session had paved the way for such legislation. One marked feature of the political movement, of which the passing of the Reform Act was a part, is a demand on the part of the people, he would not say for more government, but for more administration. It is not only sanitary measures, properly so called, but control over the dwellings provided for the working classes, and a hundred similar arrangements, which are now required at the hands of Government; and the effecting of these things has been again and again prevented by the want of any sufficient local authority. When much has to be done for society, it cannot be all done by the central Government, and there was in this country great jealousy of intrusting too much to that authority. It was a national principle that a great part of our administration should be local, and the constitutional mode of giving local government to different parts of the country, especially to towns, was by means of municipalities. Now, London had only the benefit of a municipality in that which was originally the whole of its extent—the City proper. With that exception the local government of the metropolis was a parish government. What other town in the kingdom would be satisfied with a parish administration extending over the greater portion of its area? The government of London by means of vestries had endured long enough. To show the magnitude of the questions which were involved in the local administration of the metropolis, he might mention that in the year 1840 London was rated upon an annual value of £6,000,000 sterling. In 1861 the annual value of property had risen to £12,500,000, and in 1866 to nearly £14,500,000. The expenditure of the metropolis was growing, and now amounted to nearly £3,000,000 a year. The Metropolitan Board had during the twelve years of its existence raised by rates £2,182,000, and by loans £5,581,000. The vestries collectively expended £2,784,000 per annum, while to show the quantity of legislation required to deal with local questions arising within the metropolis, Lord Brougham, so long ago as 1837, stated that the Acts relating to the parish of Marylebone alone, passed since the year 1795, filled a volume of 480 pages, being much greater in size, he would not say than the Code Napoleon, but certainly than the Code Civil. Parliament had attempted, and did attempt, to provide for this local legislation; but Parliament could not possibly do it, and it only continued the attempt because there were no local authorities in whom Parliament or the country sufficiently confided to turn over to them this important business. What had occurred with reference to the Dwellings of Artizans and Labourers Bill, introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens) was an illustration of the want of some more satisfactory authorities than at present existed in the metropolis. As originally introduced, the powers conferred by that Bill were entrusted to the vestries; but the Select Committee would not trust the vestries, and gave the powers to the Metropolitan Board of Works. The Metropolitan Board itself was, however, regarded with great distrust; and he had received many letters urging him to oppose that part of the measure which empowered that Board to levy any rates in addition to those which they were already authorized to raise. If there were municipalities in the different metropolitan boroughs, with a general central municipality, there would be authorities upon whom Parliament could confer the many powers of local administration and local regulation which at present it was necessary to provide for by separate Acts. The difference between London and other cities, arising mainly from the great size of the metropolis, was, that while for provincial cities a single corporation sufficed, in London it was necessary to have a double system. There would in London be too much for a single body to do; and any single body which was so constituted as to be able to do the work, would be so powerful that it would excite the jealousy of the other civil authorities of the country. What was proposed by the Bill which he had been requested to introduce, but of which he was not the author, although he approved of all its provisions, was, that there should be for all the Parliamentary boroughs of which the metropolis was composed, separate municipalities grouped round the City municipality, which would be the type of all; that these municipalities should discharge all such duties as did not require that the whole of London should be taken into consideration at once; and that in addition there should be a central municipality, which should deal with those questions in the decision of which the interests and wants of the whole metropolis were involved. The first of these proposals was strongly recommended by the Commission which was presided over by the late Sir George Lewis. But there was also a necessity for a general municipal government of the metropolis, and this necessity was so strongly felt that, without intending to create a municipality, Parliament had created one in the Metropolitan Board of Works. The purpose for which that Board had been called into existence—namely, the Main Drainage—was now nearly completed. But the necessity for a general government was such that, almost as soon as the Board was created, other new and important duties began to be intrusted to it. But when Parliament was creating this body, was it aware that it was establishing a municipal body for the whole of London? Did it take that large subject into consideration, and examine whether this was the best way of providing for the municipal government of a great capital? Certainly not. The Board was created for a limited and temporary purpose, and it had gradually become a central municipality, without due consideration whether it had been constituted in the way best calculated to perform the duties of such. He did not propose to supersede this body, but to leave it standing, and also to leave standing the Corporation of the City of London; but to make such changes in its constitution as would render it an adequate municipal constitution for the whole metropolis. The first Bill proposed to give muni-icipal institutions to the different Parliamentary boroughs in London; and the second, to create a central body into which the Board of Works would be absorbed: to constitute this central body in such a way as Parliament might think best, and to define its duties and powers, marking them off from those of the municipal bodies. He would conclude with a saying of Lord Coke—that no good measure of legislation was ever proposed from which, in the end, some amount of good did not result. Though in the present Session he could not hope to carry the Bills, and though great modifications might be made in them before they were carried, still he was doing that from which, according to Lord Coke's maxim, good must eventually result. The hon. Gentleman moved for leave to introduce the first Bill.

Sir Stafford Northcote

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, on the part of the Secretary of State, had to say that the Government would offer no opposition to the introduction of the Bills, considering that they would conduce to the ultimate satisfactory settlement of the question if marked, as he was sure they would be, by that careful consideration of the subject which all would expect at the hands of the hon. Gentleman.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he had no objection to make to the creation of municipal bodies for those parts of the metropolis which are now without them—such as Westminster and Chelsea; but the great difficulty would be with the central body, and how that difficulty was to be overcome the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stuart Mill) had not satisfactorily explained. How he was to reconcile the powers of the Corporation of the City of London with those of the Metropolitan Board of Works, or in what manner both bodies were to be amalgamated, the hon. Gentleman had omitted to say. The City of London was one of the most ancient institutions of the country, and claimed exclusive jurisdiction within its own limits; and the City was the only representative body in this great metropolis. Supposing a Princess of Wales or the Sultan were coming into London, the City, headed by the Lord Mayor, was the only body to receive them. Before the Bill proceeded further a considerably larger amount of information would be required by the House than the general philosophical principles which the hon. Member for Westminster had laid before them.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. J. Stuart Mill

Bill to provide for the establishment of Municipal Corporations within the Metropolis, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MILL, Mr. THOMAS HUGHES, Mr. TOMLINE, Mr. BUXTON, and Mr. LAYARD.

CORPORATION OF LONDON BILL.

On Motion of Mr. MILL, Bill for the creation of a Corporation of London, ordered to be brought in by Mr. MILL, Mr. THOMAS HUGHES, Mr. TOMLINE, Mr. BUXTON, and Mr. LAYARD.

STOCKBROKERS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. PIM, Bill to amend the Act passed in the Session of Parliament held in Ireland in the thirty-ninth year of the reign of His Majesty King George the Third, intituled "An Act for the better Regulation of Stockbrokers," ordered to be brought in by Mr. PIM and Sir BENJAMIN GUINNESS.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, May 6, 1868.

MINUTES.]—WAYS AND MEANS—Resolutions [May 4] reported.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Consolidated Fund (£1,000,000).*

First Reading—Stockbrokers (Ireland)* [104].

Second Reading—Mines Assessment [11]; Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court [50]; Cotton Statistics [96].

Considered as amended—Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings [88].

MINES ASSESSMENT BILL—[BILL 11.]

(Mr. Percy Wyndham, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Mr. Henderson.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time said, its object was to secure a more equitable distribution of local taxation than existed at present. The Bill before the House imposes further taxation; but until property now exempted from taxation is made to bear a fair share of the burdens of the country, the people would object to any increase of those burdens. The natural objection to taxes of every description was augmented, and the opposition to any proposed increase of local taxation was made more earnest in consequence of the inequality with which the rates were imposed. It had been objected that the Preamble of the Bill did not correctly recite the present state of the law with regard to the rating of mines, but he contended that it did, and that it was those who objected to it who were in error. At the close of the last century, by a decision of Lord Mansfield, all mines except coal mines were held to be free from local taxation; but according to a recent decision if the lord of the mine receives his royalty in any way in kind he is rateable because he is to that extent an occupier. This was a contradictory law, easily evaded, and its effect was, that property to the extent of £6,400,000 a year did not pay anything towards the rates of the country. The exemption did not extend to Ireland or Scotland, and this made the anomaly the greater. Very little would be needed to show how unjust to the ordinary ratepayer was this exemption of certain mines from liability to contribute to parish expenditure. A mine in full work in any district drew into its neighbourhood a large number of workmen, for whom dwellings defective in all sanitary arrangements were hastily built; and if, as often happened, the mine became exhausted, or fell into disuse from any other reason, a large number of those workmen and their families became more or less a burden to the parish, though their employers had contributed nothing in the days of their prosperity to the parish purse. Of 324 paupers in a Union in one of the Cornish districts in 1865 he found that only fifty-two were of the agricultural class — the rest had all been miners; and the mines had not contributed one farthing to the poor rate. Then, again, great injury was done to roads by the carting of heavy ore from the mine to the railway; yet these roads had to be repaired at the expense of the farmers and shopkeepers, while the owners of the mines were altogether exempted from liability to contribute. Without further dilating on this point he would proceed to explain the provisions of the Bill. According to an Act recently passed the mines should only be rated as grass lands. The Bill proposed that they should be assessed according to the Parochial Act of Will. III. The 1st clause provided that all mines should be rated at an estimate of the net annual value. In Committee he should ask leave to amend that clause, because the net annual value of a mine was never paid. It would be paid if the lessee entered into possession of the mine with its plant all fixed, the shaft sunk, and the whole mine ready for work, but that was never the case. The royalty paid by the lessee of a mine resembled the rent which would be paid by a farmer under a thirty years' lease of a piece of moorland; and the net annual value of a mine resembled the net annual value of that piece of moorland after it had been drained and fenced, and brought under cultivation. He contended that inasmuch as a piece of re-claimed moorland was assessed at its improved annual value, a mine in full operation should be also assessed according to its worth. The 2nd clause too, which referred to the royalties obtained where mines had been abandoned and afterwards been taken up again, as well as the 3rd clause, required amendment, and he appealed to the hon. Member for Durham (Mr. Pease) to assist him in coming to some satisfactory arrangement with regard to the deductions which should be allowed in estimating the net annual value of mines. In certain cases, no doubt, the royalties did indicate the actual value of the mine; but in a mine there was certainly a diminished rateable value according to the decreasing value of the produce; and in order to ascertain the just payment it was proposed to capitalize the whole value of the mine at fifteen years, and base the assessment on that. The equitable deduction as between the annual and rateable value was, in his opinion, about one-third. He was himself in favour of the proposal to leave some points in the hands of the local Assessment Committees; but these matters could be easily settled in Committee, with respect to the exception of mines in Derbyshire, Cornwall, and Devon from the operations of the Act; the mines of Derbyshire were already rated in accordance with a local arrangement which satisfied everyone concerned, including the parish authorities and the ordinary ratepayer — an arrangement which it would be unwise to disturb. The mines of Cornwall and Devon were hazardous as speculations, and during the last two years had been by no means prosperous; it was therefore proposed by the 5th clause to relieve the occupiers of those mines from liability, to transfer it to the owners, and to assess the rate on the royalty paid by the lessee. If, however, it was deemed unjust to treat one portion of the kingdom differently from another, he would have no objection to exempt from liability all mines whose success was doubtful. The 6th clause, providing for the assessment of mines under the provisions of the Local Government Act or any Local Improvement Acts, in the same way as arable land was assessed, he proposed to make prospective only. As the principle of the Bill had been already assented to, he would not further detain the House but would formally move the second reading.

MR. ST. AUBYN, in seconding the Motion, said, he entirely approved of, and concurred in, the principle of the Bill. Many meetings had taken place in Cornwall with reference to the Bill; and although there were small differences as to the details of the measure, yet all classes—agricultural, town, and mining—had unanimously come to the conclusion that mining property ought no longer to be exempted from contributing its fair and just proportion to the local rates.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Percy Wyndham).

MR. PEASE said, he did not rise to oppose the second reading of the Bill. Two years ago he admitted that mines ought to be rated; but he was exceedingly opposed to rushing headlong into legislation upon the subject; for there were many difficulties to be considered. He objected to mineral mines being rated as coal mines now were; because no fixed principles were acted on in the case of coal mines; and he contended that the amendment should be conducted in accordance with a fixed system applicable to all mines. A Return made on the Motion of the hon. Member for Whitby (Mr. Bagnall) showed how utterly opposed to reason was the practice which had grown up in respect of the rating of coal mines. The 3rd clause, relating to the deductions to be made from the gross value to find the net rent, seemed adapted to give rise to innumerable lawsuits; it would be far better if a definite rate of deduction were fixed upon for the purpose. He also objected to Clause 5 as far as it set up a different standard for different counties. No doubt the miners of Cornwall and Devon deserved every consideration the House could give under the circumstances; but it would be very unfair if they were relieved altogether from liability to pay local rates. As, however, ordinary principles of assessment were not applicable to mines, he would suggest that an increased deduction should be allowed in the case of mines commercially hazardous.

Mr. Percy Wyndham

MR. DENMAN said, he agreed with the principle of the Bill, and as it proposed to make mining property rateable, and to have the rates levied in the same way as the highway rate, he would take occasion to point out the necessity that existed for altering the present mode of assessing highway rates. If the Bill were passed it would raise more pointedly than ever the question whether the highway rates should be wholly payable out of the real property of the country. By the present law a clergyman with a small glebe had to pay a heavy highway rate, whilst his neighbour, a rich brewer, who resided within the borough, and used the highway in the prosecution of his business, had no rate to pay. He hoped Parliament would remedy the grievance in the next Session of Parliament.

MR. KENDALL said, that many years since he endeavoured to pass a Bill for the rating of mines, but the difficulties were so great that he had to abandon it. In Cornwall all parties had agreed that it was but fair and just that mines should be rated, and that the whole expense should fall on the owners of the mines. He was at a loss to understand why such an arrangement should be a cause of complaint with other counties. He warned the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Percy Wyndham) against endeavouring to pass the 5th clause in a form objectionable to Cornish interests and contrary to the report of the Select Committee upon the rating of mines. He should assist in every way to make the Bill workable, but unless a fair and just principle was applied to the case of the Cornish people, he should oppose the third reading.

MR. BRUCE said, he wished to point out that although the Bill had met with general approval as to its principle, it was so framed that it either left unsettled, or settled on different principles, the subject of the rating of mines. He was not satisfied that Clause 5 was founded on a just principle. The just principle seemed to be that now in force—namely, that the actual value from year to year of the property should be estimated fairly. Uniformity, above all things, was needed; if deductions from gross value were to be allowed in the case of copper and tin mines, why should they not be allowed in the assessment of coal mines? It seemed to him to be monstrous that a tin mine in full operation and making good returns should be rated on more favourable terms than a coal mine. He did not insist that it should be rated for all years on the estimate of any one year, but that a fair average should be struck for the assessor's guidance. The hon. Member who introduced the Bill had omitted from his very clear statement an important point arising out of Clause 6. The effect of that clause would be that coal mines which are now rated to their fullest extent would be assessed at only one quarter of their annual value. That seemed to him a very doubtful measure; he had always approved the principle laid down by Sir George Lewis that all exemptions for rating purposes were impolitic; and for this proposed exemption in favour of coal mines he could imagine no reason whatever. If any one wished to find a district where the roads were bad, where small ill-built houses abounded, and pauperism was chronic, and where, consequently, expenditure on sanitary grounds was required, let him go to a new colliery district. The colliery drew around it a large population of the poorest description, and it should be made liable to pay local rates as much as any other property. Trusting that these points would be considered in Committee, he had no objection to the second reading of the Bill.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH said, respecting the wish for uniformity of assessment, that the difficulty of dealing with the 5th clause, as far as it affected Derbyshire, could be appreciated only by those who knew what a happy state of things existed there in consequence of the agreement already referred to. The mines of Derbyshire had always been rated. The assessment was made on the royalty paid to the Duchy of Lancaster, and the rate was paid by the Duchy; so that the parish actually got more from the mines than it would get if the occupier were rated, because the poorer miners would, of necessity, have to be excused. He suggested something in the nature of a Bill for compounding mining rates; if that could be managed the Derbyshire arrangement might stand.

MR. BAGNALL said, he could not understand why woodlands and plantations should escape rating and coal mines be made the victims. The argument that woodlands and plantations were exempted in order not to check the growth of the timber for the purposes of the Royal Navy, did not apply in the present day.

MR. CANDLISH said, that by the operation of the 6th clause all mines rated after the passing of the Bill would be subjected to one-fourth of the gross amount of their valuation, while existing mines would pay the same as they paid now. It was perfectly clear that this was not equitable, and he hoped the clause would be expunged. He cautioned the hon. Member (Mr. Percy Wyndham) against all exemptions. They might lead to unequal taxation even in the same district, for it would be impossible to adopt one uniform system of making deductions from the assessment. The true principle was to rate in the full amount every mine wherever situated, not only for parochial but for municipal purposes. If any works tendered more than others to deteriorate the public health they were coal mines. Rates for sanitary purposes ought to be paid by all mines as they were paid by manufactories.

MR. CORRANCE thought the hon. Member deserved the thanks of the House for bringing the matter forward. He approved the principle of the Bill though he thought some modifications of its details would be necessary in Committee. But with reference to the whole subject of rating he complained that no principle had yet been fixed on by the Legislature as the basis for any rate at present existing. The law had come into its present state by a course of fortuitous legislation and accidental judgments, and the sooner it was thoroughly examined and re-modelled on a definite principle the better it would be for all concerned. He hoped on an early day to call the attention of the House to the subject.

MR. VIVIAN said, he agreed that it would be desirable to rate all mines on the same principle without exception. The principle of assessment in South Wales at present was most unjust. Coal mines in that district were rated on profits. In no other trade was this principle followed; and in the case of mines it was especially unjust, because the corpus of the mine was being continually exhausted. When coal had been won it might very properly be regarded as stock in trade; so that not only were profits rated, but the stock in trade which had been purchased by the outlay in plant and all the preliminary work of sinking the shaft was rated as well. That was extremely unjust, and on this account, if for no other, he desired to see some principle laid down. But the Bill seemed to propose the rating of other mines on no fixed principle. The 1st clause did not accord with the 2nd; and in both royalty seemed to be confounded with rent, though it was well known these two things very much differed. If the principle were to prevail at all it ought to be made applicable to all mines.

MR. PUGH said, he had great pleasure in voting for the second reading of this Bill, as, independently of its other recommendations, it was not only founded on the Report of the Select Committee of the House of Lords—which resolved that it was expedient that all mines should be assessed, as coal mines now were, inasmuch as their exemption from rates was founded on no sound principles, but was also in accordance with a strong opinion expressed by a Court of Law of high authority—the Court of Exchequer Chamber, in the case of “Crease v. Sawle.” They said that the statute of Elizabeth was, in truth, framed with a view to render rateable all occupiers of every description of real estate; and it might be very questionable whether occupiers of mines of any description were exempt at all. Therefore this was a beneficial Bill, as framed for the purpose of putting an end to legal doubts. It was also founded on justice; and if in Committee it should be proposed, as had been already suggested in the course of the discussion, that its principle should be extended to other kinds of property—plantations, for example—he should be very happy to give the proposition his favourable consideration.

MR. WYLD said, he thought that the principle laid down in Clause 6 of the Bill ought to be adhered to.

MR. W. H. LEATHAM said, he had been requested by his constituents to oppose the second reading of this Bill; but after the explanation of the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Percy Wyndham) he should not do so, but confine his objections to the 6th clause, by which all mines were to be rated, under the Local Government Act, and Local Improvement Act, at one-fourth of their value. His constituents considered this a most unjust provision of the Bill, because in the borough which he represented (Wakefield) the coal measures extended under the town, and there was a great traffic of coal carts through the streets, thereby damaging the pavement and sometimes even crushing in the gas-pipes; and to rate the coalpits at only one-fourth of their value was to make them contribute a less share towards the repair of the streets than was reasonable. He hoped the hon. Member for West Cumberland would alter the clause, or he must give it his most strenuous opposition in Committee.

Mr. Vivian

MR. W. B. BEAUMONT said, that when persons sought for privileges and exemptions they were bound to make out a strong case. He should not resist the proposal to rate the lessors instead of the lessees; but he was at a loss to know why the great mines of Devonshire should be rated upon a different principle to the coal mines of Northumberland; and, in behalf of his constituents in the North, he should in Committee offer his most uncompromising opposition to any clause proposing exemptions in favour of any particular districts.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM thanked the House for the manner in which the Bill had been received. Nothing would give him greater satisfaction than that the Government should take charge of the Bill. If it remained in his hands, he should attend to the suggestions of his right hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr Tydfil (Mr. Bruce) and his hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Vivian). He would take care that the Preamble should be made to apply equally to all mines whether of salt, metal, or coal.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he should support the Bill, the principle of it being to bring mines which had not hitherto been within the purview of rating within such scope. On the general question of rating there could be no greater public benefactor than the person who would invent such a definition of the mode of rating as might be easily applied, not only to coal mines, but to other descriptions of property. The difficulty of carrying out the existing rules was so great that they could scarcely be acted upon by any two lawyers in the same manner. He thought the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill had done well to confine himself to a practical object; and he would endeavour to assist him in any way he could to make the present Bill a satisfactory measure.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday, 20th May.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES COURT BILL—[BILL 50.]

(Mr. Charles Forster, Mr. Headlam, Mr. Kinglake)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. C. FORSTER, in moving that this Bill be now read the second time, said, that its object was to get rid of the delay which now occurred in the despatch of business in causes of divorce. In any case delay in legal proceedings was a source of annoyance and expense, but in no branch of the law could the evil thus caused be more seen than in suits for the dissolution of marriage. It was desirable to make the proceedings, when once commenced, as expeditious as possible. At present, even in undefended cases, suitors are unable to obtain a decree dissolving the marriage under two years. The delay need not exist if the House would agree to the three propositions contained in the Bill. The first proposition was to shorten the time allowed for appealing against the decisions or rules nisi in all cases of divorce. He wished to make the practice of the Divorce side of the Court at Westminster the same as that on the Probate side of the same Court—namely, that notice of appeal in any case should be entered within one month after the hearing and decision of the cause. At present appeals against decrees in the Divorce Court could not be lodged during the Parliamentary Recess. The Bill would abolish that prohibition. The second proposition was to take away the right of appeal in undefended cases; for he could not think that any person, either man or woman, who had a good defence, would hold it back till the appeal and submit to have a decree pronounced by default. The third proposition was to make the right of appeal to follow directly upon the decree nisi, instead of parties having to wait till the decree was made absolute. He understood that this last provision was the one which was likely to meet with most opposition. It would, perhaps, be urged that such a permission would be an anomaly in the practice of Courts. But it must be remembered that for some time after the institution of the Divorce Court there was only one decree which was final; and that the decree nisi had been introduced, only to give the Queen's Proctor an opportunity of intervening if collusion was suspected. As between the parties the decree nisi was final if a third party did not intervene. He believed the only effect of the present system of delay was to enable parties to extort money by a threat of appealing, which it was never intended to carry out. The great object of his Bill was to put an end to delays which could serve no good purpose.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. C. Forster.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that on the part of the Government he would not object to the second reading of the Bill, because he believed that his hon. Friend had hit upon one defect in the present state of the law, and that his Bill provided a remedy for it. He meant that part of the present law which provided that no appeal should be lodged in the House of Lords while that House was not sitting. He regretted that he could not go further in his support of the Bill. When the other matters came under the consideration of the Committee he must hold himself free to object to the clauses. An appeal on a decree or rule nisi did not exist in any other Court, and he could not see why it should be allowed in the Divorce Court.

MR. HEADLAM was sorry that the Government had limited their support to such a narrow portion of the Bill. He had read the Bill and he could not see what objection there could be to its provisions, the whole of which had no other object than to stop unnecessary delay.

MR. M. CHAMBERS said, he approved that portion of the Bill which required the appeal to be lodged after the pronouncing of the decree nisi. According to the present state of the law, the decree nisi was really an absolute decree to take effect on a certain day, unless the Queen's Advocate or some other party should intervene before that time.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

COTTON STATISTICS BILL—[BILL 96.]

(Mr. Bazley, Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Horsfall, Mr. Watkin, Mr. Cheetham.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BAZLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, its object was to provide accurate statistics of the cotton trade, by taking steps to procure correct information of all the cotton which was landed at the various ports of this country, and by obtaining from all carriers returns of their removals of cotton from one place to another, and periodical returns from all warehousemen of the expected supply and quantities of stock in hand. He believed this measure, if it were adopted, would prevent undue speculation in this important staple of manufacture and commerce, and that it would lead to a more equitable and regular employment of capital and labour, and be equally beneficial to merchants, manufacturers, operatives, and consumers.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Wednesday next.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS BILL—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens, Mr. Kinnaird, Mr. Locke.)

CONSIDERATION. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [29th April], "That the Clause (Act not to apply to cases in which freeholder has successfully instituted proceedings and carries out necessary repairs.)—(Sir Francis Goldsmid),—which was offered to be added on Consideration of the Bill, as amended, be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. AYRTON said his hon. Friend the Member for Reading (Sir Francis Goldsmid) who was now absent from the House, had no desire to press the clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause (Act not to apply to cases in which defects are caused by local authority.)—(Sir Francis Goldsmid),—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 21, to leave out the word "surveyors," in order to insert the word "surveyor,"—(Mr. Candlish),—instead thereof.

Question, "That the word 'surveyors' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS said, he had some new clauses on the Paper, intended to give greater security to owners of property. The effect of them was that all intermediary, as well as the primary owners of property should receive notice of any operations intended under this Bill. He reminded the House that on the last day the Bill was discussed the Attorney General suggested that it required some additional provisions in the direction suggested by the hon. Member for Reading. He (Mr. Torrens) had received a communication from the Attorney General, and he was authorized by him to state to the House that the Amendments which stood in his (Mr. Torrens's) name on the Notice Paper were prepared under the direction of the Attorney General by the Government draftsman, and submitted to him for final approval; and the Attorney General had requested him to move them on the Report. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Reading would agree with him in thinking that the changes which he now proposed to introduce, by the authority of the Attorney General, were sufficient substantially to accomplish his object. Taking into consideration the period of the Session, and the mass of business before the House, he hoped he would be allowed to take the Report without any material changes except those to which he had alluded.
Mr. Basley

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS moved, in Clause 3, line 12, to leave out from the word "lessee" to "premises," and insert—

"The expression 'owner,' in addition to the definition given by the Land Clauses Act, hereafter incorporated with this Act, in reference to any premises, shall include all the owners, if more than one, of any premises or estate, or interest in any premises required to be dealt with under this Act."

Motion agreed to.

MR. GOLDNEY moved to insert at the end of Clause 4—

"And for the purposes of this Act the term 'the promoters of the said undertaking' used in those Acts shall mean the local authority as defined by the Act."

Motion agreed to.

Schedule A.

MR. AYRTON moved to leave out from "The city of London and the Liberties thereof" to the end of line 10. The matter had been discussed on a previous occasion, and as the attendance in the House was now so small he should not press his Motion, though he wished to have it put from the Chair, in order that his dissent from the proposed mode of legislation might be distinctly recorded.

Amendment proposed, in First Schedule, Table A, to leave out from the words "The City of London and the Liberties thereof" to the end of line 10. — (Mr. Ayrton.)

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, that originally the City of London was a walled city, and consequently contained a greater number of lanes and alleys than any other part of the metropolis, and there could be no injustice in allowing the City to put the Bill in force themselves.

MR. CRAWFORD said, it was a mistake for the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets to say that the City of London would save anything by not being subject to the rate which would be levied by the Board of Works.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS thought it was hardly just that the whole of the metropolis should be taxed throughout, with the exception of the City of London, for improvements effected under the Bill.

MR. M'CULLAGH TORRENS said, the Amendment had not originated with him, but with the Select Committee. In no part of the metropolis did he get so much support for his Bill as in the City of London.

MR. LOCKE said, it was the City of London that really created the working classes of the metropolis, as it was the great employer of labour. The City supplied poor to the whole metropolis, and it should not therefore seek to be exempted from the general rate.

MR. AYRTON said, he would confine his Amendment to the question of authority, leaving untouched the question of taxation.

MR. LOCKE said, it was simply a question whether the Board of Works or the Corporation should carry out the Act. It was not a question of taxation; but a fanciful one, of pride, on the part of the City, which did not like to be interfered with.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that the effect of the Amendment evidently was to increase the taxation of the City of London.

MR. CANDLISH took the same view as the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. SPEAKER said, it seemed to him that the Amendment would have this effect—that improvements undertaken beyond the limits of the City of London would, after the alteration proposed, affect the taxation on the City of London. In that case it would effect an alteration of taxation which should have originated in a Committee of the Whole House, and could not be proposed on consideration of the Report.

MR. AYRTON disclaimed any intention of interfering with the taxation of the metropolis. His object was to declare that the Metropolitan Board of Works should have the authority for carrying out the Bill throughout the whole Metropolis. It was his intention to move that the Bill be re-committed.

And it appearing, on further discussion, that the proposed Amendment would vary the incidence of taxation, Mr. SPEAKER declined to put the Question.

Amendment proposed, in First Schedule, Table A, to leave out from the words "The Metropolis," in line 13, to the end of line 21, inclusive, in order to insert the words—

The Metro- polis	The Vestries and Local Boards re- spectively	The general vote leviable under "The Metropolis Management Act, "1855"	The Clerk
---------------------	---	---	-----------

—(Mr. Labouchere.)

—instead thereof.

But it appearing that the proposed Amendment would vary the incidence of taxation, Mr. SPEAKER declined to put the Question."

Bill to be read the third time upon Friday.

House adjourned at a quarter before Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, May 7, 1868.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Marquess of Salisbury, after the Death of his Father.

PUBLIC BILLS.—Second Reading—Capital Punishment within Prisons (83); Industrial Schools (Ireland) * (69).

Third Reading—Medical Practitioners (Colonies)* (78), and passed.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENTS WITHIN PRISONS BILL—(No. 83.)
(The Duke of Richmond)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, it had already passed through the House of Commons; and its object was to provide that in future all executions of criminals shall take place within the walls of prisons. The subject had been thoroughly considered by a Royal Commission who had recommended that a Bill to this effect should be introduced. A Committee, of which a right rev. Prelate who presides over the diocese of Oxford was Chairman, had come to a similar conclusion. It was believed that, instead of public executions doing good or operating as a deterrent among criminals, the revolting scenes which, on many occasions, took place before the gallows, especially in the metropolis, did considerable harm, and ought to be prevented. The Bill provided that in future all executions of criminals should take place within the walls of the prisons, in the presence of the sheriff and others who were named, that the prison surgeon should certify the death of the criminal, and that a coroner's inquest should be held upon the body.

LORD CRANWORTH expressed his approval of the principle of the Bill, which he hoped would put a stop to the Saturnalia which occurred on the occasion of every execution in the metropolis.

LORD HOUGHTON also expressed his satisfaction at such a measure being likely to become law, he having had the honour on several occasions of bringing the subject of public executions, with their evil consequences, before the House of Commons.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

RAILWAYS—ACCIDENT UPON THE BRECON AND NEATH RAILWAY.
QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked the noble Duke the President of the Board of Trade, Whether any Report was made to the Board of Trade of the fatal Occurrence on the Brecon and Neath Railway, on Friday, the 24th of April last, in which Case the Jury at the Inquest returned a Verdict of "Wilful Murder?" It appeared that, on the occasion of the accident, a passenger train—which, fortunately, carried no passengers, although a mail train—ran into a siding in consequence of the points having been displaced, and the result was that the engine-driver was killed. It appeared that the points were usually kept in position by means of a pin, which had, to the knowledge of the servants of the Company, been missing for twenty-four hours prior to the accident. The coroner's jury returned a verdict of "Wilful murder against some person unknown." No notice of the matter had been taken by the Board of Trade which had, in matters of this kind, no proper control over railway companies. The case was one in which companies were not bound to make any reference whatever to the Board of Trade. Had the person killed been a passenger, the Company would have been bound to report the facts to the Board of Trade, and they would have sent down an Inspector to make a special inquiry into the facts. But even in that case the Board of Trade would have been powerless; for they could not enforce the recommendations of their Inspector. When this siding was opened, but before it was used, an Inspector was sent down to examine it, and he particularly recommended, indeed ordered, that an instrument called an "indicator" should be placed there. The indicator was accordingly placed there by the Company at an expense of £10 or £12; but it was never used—in fact, he was told the instrument was very rarely used by railway companies except within crowded stations. After all, what a farce it was that the Board of Trade should have power to make Orders which they had not the power to enforce—or rather that their Order having been made and an indicator placed, the Board should have no power to compel the use of the instrument. Such a case as the present was not of very common occurrence, but there were incidents of an analogous kind which happened every day all over the country. The Board of Trade, having no power, escaped responsibility; but it was the duty of Parliament, he thought, to take care that the safety of passengers was properly attended to, and impose that responsibility. The late Duke of Wellington expressed his opinion very strongly that the Government should have more power over railway companies; but the railway interest was too strong for them in the House of Commons. He hoped the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) would see that sufficient powers were obtained in his Bill for the regulation of railways. He had himself given notice of a clause, but it was not sufficiently stringent. He wished to ask the noble Duke, Whether the Board of Trade had received any accounts on the subject to which he had called his attention; and, whether he would lay them on the Table?

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was not aware that it had been the intention of the noble Marquess to enter so much at length into the law which at present prevails with regard to accidents on railways: nor did he anticipate that he would refer to the opinions of the Duke of Wellington on the subject of railway management. Had he known such to be the intention of the noble Marquess, he should have been prepared with a more satisfactory answer. The noble Marquess was incorrect in thinking that no notice of this accident was taken by the Board of Trade. On hearing of the accident, the Board of Trade communicated with the Railway Company, requiring them to transmit to the Board every particular connected with the accident. That Report reached the Board this afternoon, and tomorrow an Inspector would proceed to inquire into the facts and causes of the accident.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that as the noble Duke had used the phrase "on hearing of the accident" it seemed clear that no Report was made by the Company to the Board of Trade, in the first instance. The Board heard of it only casually and through the usual channels of information, not on special information from the Company.

House adjourned at a Quarter before
Six o'Clock; till To-morrow,
Half past Ten o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, May 7, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee
—Exchequer Bonds (£800,000).

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Municipal Corporations (Metropolis) * [105]; Partition * [107].

Second Reading—Representation of the People (Ireland) [71]; Vagrant Act Amendment * [102].

Committee—Documentary Evidence * [97].

Report—Documentary Evidence * [97].

SCOTLAND—TRAWLING FOR HERRINGS. QUESTION.

MR. LAMONT said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether he intends to bring in a Bill to repeal or to modify the Act of last Session which legalized Trawling for Herrings in the West of Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, in reply, that the Herring Fishery (Scotland) Act 1867, was passed in accordance with recommendations of the Royal Commissions of 1863 and 1866. The official information which had reached him as to the working of the Act was favourable, both as regarded the quantity of fish taken and as to the cessation of those acts of violence which had frequently resulted from the enforcement of the prohibitions against trawling. He had therefore no intention of introducing a measure to repeal the Act of last Session.

QUEENSLAND— POLYNESIAN LABOURERS.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government has received from Queensland a Bill passed by the Legislature there to legalize the introduction of Polynesian Labourers; and, if so, whether he will state what course the Government propose to recommend Her Majesty to adopt in respect to such Bill?

MR. ADDERLEY said, in reply, that although the Bill had passed both Houses of the Legislature in Queensland, the Governor did not state that he had as yet given his assent to it. No doubt, however, he had done so. He mentioned that the Bill included all the provisions which had been suggested both for regulating the immigration of such labourers and for guarding against abuse. The Papers which had already been moved for were being prepared, and, if the Bill arrived in time, it would be laid with them upon the table.

METROPOLIS—PARK LANE.—QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, By whose authority a Pavement is being laid down on the West Side of Park Lane, thereby reducing the portion of ground taken from the Park for the purpose of the roadway from eighteen feet to less than twelve feet?

LORD JOHN MANNERS, in reply, said the operations to which the hon. Gentleman referred were being executed by the Metropolitan Board of Works in accordance with ask the Secretary of State for War, whether it is true, as stated in The Times of the 2nd of April, with regard to the military stationed at the Mauritius, that there was now an ample supply of quinine and other drugs, which there had not been at first, and which are most useful in meeting the attacks of Fever now prevalent in that Island?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied, that he was happy to say that there was not, and had not been, any deficiency of medical supplies such as that represented. The statement must have been founded upon a misapprehension.

ARMY—PROMOTION IN THE COLDSTREAM GUARDS.—QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, reverting to a Question on Thursday, the 30th ultimo, relative to the late promotions in the Coldstream Guards, he was aware of the fact that in 1855 Captain Dormer, being the only Ensign and Lieutenant of the Grenadier Guards then possessing two years' Army service, was promoted over fifteen Officers who stood before him on the Regimental List, but who had not the requisite service, the Ensign at the top of the list only requiring sixteen days to complete his service for the step; and whether, having regard to Clause 44 of the Royal Warrant of the 3rd day of February, 1866, and to the precedent of Captain Dormer's case, the Secretary of State for War will state why

hon. Baron his Question adopted was 44 of the February, of the Class

"The vast of the sea
pear expedie and to Our should be of

It was after
of the air
that the p
one that it
that it was of the Ar should be officers ab of their b could be, a

SIR PA give Notice of Supply
enactance
the Coldst

THE EST

SIR RC to ask the duties and High Com
sembly of of what f
what is tl

sents Her Majesty in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. During the sitting of the Assembly in the Scottish capital, the Lord High Commissioner holds levées, and discharges other duties, as the representative of Royalty, in which members of other Churches, as well as those of the Established Church, take part, out of respect for the Commissioner as the representative of Her Majesty. The allowance made to the Commissioner to defray the expenditure of that office is £2,000, which was formerly defrayed out of the hereditary revenues of the Crown in Scotland; but in consequence of the surrender of those revenues, the sum is charged upon the Consolidated Fund. I am not aware of any other salaries paid to other officers in the department of the Commissioner; and I believe that the sum I have mentioned is necessary in order to defray the expenditure connected with the office. In the Census of 1861 in Scotland no account is taken of the religious opinions of the people of Scotland. It is, therefore, difficult to give a precise answer to the last part of the Question of the right hon. Baronet. I may state, however, that estimates have been made tending to show that members of the Established Church of Scotland constitute about one-half of the population. But I am quite aware it is possible other parties may hold the opinion that the Established Church is in a minority, as compared with the aggregate of the several other religious communions in Scotland.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, When it is his intention to proceed with the Scotch Reform Bill?

MR. DISRAELI: I certainly hope to proceed with the Scotch Reform Bill on Monday.

MR. BOUVERIE said, he wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that the Order for going into Committee on the Navy Estimates stood first on the Paper on Monday, and he wished to know, whether the Scotch Reform Bill was to take precedence?

MR. DISRAELI: It is necessary that the Navy Estimates should be the first Order on Monday; but the Scotch Reform Bill will be taken immediately afterwards.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND)— THE MEETING AT ST. JAMES'S HALL. QUESTION.

MR. VERNER: Sir, I have to apologise to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire for asking him a Question, of which I have not had an opportunity of giving him Notice; but I should like to know, Whether his attention has been directed to the report of the speeches made by certain right rev. Prelates appointed by the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a distinguished Member, which speeches were made yesterday at St. James's Hall; and, if so, whether, after the opinions they have expressed, he intends to press on his measures for the destruction of the Irish branch of the United Church of England and Ireland?

MR. GLADSTONE made no reply.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (IRELAND). COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. GLADSTONE, in rising to move the second Resolution, said: Sir, now that I am on my legs, let me say one word in answer to the Question of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Verner). ["No. no!"] I did not wish to answer that Question at the moment, because I own I thought it was beyond the line of Parliamentary practice; but, at the same time, I think the substance of the Question of the hon. Gentleman was such that, if he choose to put it to me in Committee, it would be a perfectly proper one from his point of view; and therefore, as I do not wish to be guilty of any discourtesy, I will answer it. In a free country like this, when the minds of men are deeply stirred and actively at work on a question such as the one now before us, I am not surprised that some men of eminence and excellence should not agree in, but, on the contrary, should disapprove the course which, impelled by a sense of public duty, I feel called upon to take; but I cannot on that account be discouraged when I see that the majority of this House, in the course they have adopted with respect to the Irish Church, are supported by the warm and very general judgment of the country. I intend to say not one word in regard of the general discussion. I only rise now because, though the Resolution which I am about to propose—the second Resolution—is a perfectly practical one in itself, it depends no doubt on the first Resolution, and therefore it is right that I should state the political and practical reasons which induce me to think the Committee will have no difficulty in accepting it. With respect to the political reasons I will be brief. In the beginning of these discussions my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India (Sir Stafford Northcote) said he objected—and I thought at the time with great reason—to any attempt on our part to close up this subject in the form of an abstract Resolution. Undoubtedly my right hon. Friend cannot estimate too highly the objection to dealing with important questions by abstract Resolutions alone. Nobody can feel greater objection than I do to dealing with a matter of this great importance in such a way. I never have been a party to such a proceeding, and I hope I never shall be. I say this on high grounds of public policy; and the grounds in this case are special as well as general. We cannot but recollect that, without any justice, as I think, but with some show of plausibility, the charge was made against us that we have not dealt sincerely with this matter, but have been using it merely for party purposes of our own. I do not in a matter of this kind wish to enter into the game of bandying assertions and negations. No one is convinced by those assertions or negations, and for the most part they are of a futile character, so far as such matters are concerned; but I think we ought to give the best proof in our power that we are dealing with this subject as men ready to be responsible for what they do. The only proof we can afford of that readiness is to give effect to our intentions, so far as the time requires and demands, in the shape of a practical measure. I fully admit also that the lengthened period during which this question, as a party question or a great political question, has slumbered since it was brought before us in 1838, enhances that consideration. I hope that in what I have said I have given no offence to anyone; and I now proceed to submit reasons of a practical character for passing such a Resolution as that which I am about to propose. If I said that the object of the Resolution was to save a large sum of money I should be saying what was perfectly true, but what would be very far from the whole truth. Take, for instance, the lapse of a bishopric of £3,000, £4,000, or £5,000 a year, or it might be of a considerably larger amount. Now, if the House should adopt no measure to put into a practical shape the abstract Resolution on the subject of the Irish Church, it would not only be within the province, but I will go further and say it would be the duty, of the Executive to make an appointment to any bishopric which might become vacant, just as if no such Resolution had been adopted. That being so, even as a question of money, the question is whether, in the view of the probability of such vacancy, life-interests of the value of perhaps £30,000, £40,000, or £50,000 are to be taken out of the discretion of Parliament, and brought within the category of vested interests, which completely secures them from being handled by our legislation. It is not only this, but many appointments must take place in Ireland, not only of an episcopal but of a parochial character; and I wish to bring this clearly to the mind of the Committee, for I must confess that I am not unconscious of how ineffectual the operation of the Church Temporalities Act of 1835 has been to prevent the recurrence of cases of scandal. In that Act there was a provision made that where Divine service was not performed a certain number of times in the year there should be a suspension of parochial appointments; and it was thought that that would prevent the recurrence of things which I, and indeed a great many of those Gentlemen who sit opposite to me, will admit to be scandals. I will state a few cases to show the great preponderance of Roman Catholics in some parishes in proportion to the members of the Church of England, and the amount of the benefices. In the parish of Tullagh, diocese of Emly, the number of Anglicans is 44; that of Roman Catholics, 3,723; and the gross annual value of the living £573. In Kilmichael, diocese of Cork, the number of Anglicans is 34; that of Roman Catholics, 4,485; and the gross value of the living £746. In Derrymacross, diocese of Cloyne, the number of Anglicans is 14; that of Roman Catholics, 1,991; and the gross annual value of the living £565. In Shandrum the number of Anglicans is 23; that of Roman Catholics, 2,973; and the gross annual value of the living £615. Though, as a matter of course, I must wish the incumbent of that parish a long, happy, and prosperous life, yet, as the rev. gentleman has been in his present position for the last forty years, it is only natural to expect that something must occur there before a very distant date. In the parish of Kilkerry, in the diocese of Tuam, there are 36 Anglicans; 9,300 Roman Catholics; and the gross annual value of the living is £524. In Orradown the number of Anglicans is 46; that of Roman Catholics 5,745; and the gross annual value of the living £477. I think, therefore, it will be felt by all those who contemplate extensive modifications in the temporalities of the Irish Church that these are motives of very considerable force for arresting during a reasonable time—and certainly I only ask it for a reasonably short period—appointments that could not be made without continuing evils which many Gentlemen opposite admit, and appointments that, in some instances at least, all of them must feel would be injuries and scandals to the cause of religion. I need not enter into the question in what manner cases of this kind have arisen. Some of them may be owing to the dissolution of unions in instances where the authorities could not interfere. Other cases might be added; but those which I have cited to the Committee are strong ones, as showing that, in view either of the partial changes contemplated by one portion of the House, or the sweeping changes contemplated by the majority of the House, there are many places in which no new appointment should be made pending the ultimate decision of Parliament on the position of the Irish Church. Another argument I would make use of is also one which addresses itself to both sides of the House. It is quite evident that, if the plan which we have recommended in principle should be adopted, considerable difficulty will attend the transition period. While prelates and incumbents will be in possession of their benefices under the old order of things, a system of voluntary offerings will be growing up around them. Therefore, two systems may be in operation at the same time. Possibly that may be avoided; possibly it may not be avoided; but I have already indicated enough to show to hon. Gentlemen that, with the views we entertain, it is not unreasonable to say, even if there is to be this transition period, yet in the passing of a law containing a provision for stopping the growth of new vested interests, no difficulty can arise; but, on the other hand, it must prevent the unnecessary prolongation of that transition state. Perhaps my next argument is one to which I have no right to expect the assent of hon. Gentlemen opposite, though it will weigh considerably with those who desire a settlement of this question in one general sense, and it is this—Were we to stop with an abstract Resolution, we might, probably next year, be in the predicament of having to re-commence the necessarily lengthened and laborious process in which we have been this year engaged. There would be a great loss of public time and an undoubted inconvenience in the shape of the interruption of the course of Public Business—a circumstance which I do not for a moment hesitate to conceal, although I freely admit I think that, at all times, secondary public objects must be sacrificed to those which are of primary importance. I do not, however, deny the inconvenience, and I say that the rational course for us, having advanced to the point we have now reached, is, as far as we can, to make good and fortify our ground, and especially in this point of view—that when it shall once have been the pleasure of Parliament to adopt, in the shape of a legislative Act, provisions which shall put a stop to new appointments in the Irish Church, from that moment forward, there will, I think, be a very general, or, at all events, a very extended, opinion among our opponents, as well as among those who support us, that it will be for the interest of all parties to accelerate the final settlement of the measure. I have no doubt that by giving this practical shape to the design and proceedings on which we have entered we shall practically bring our side of the House, and even many among those who may have differed from us originally, to the conclusion that, after the decisive proceedings of Parliament, their best course will be to give their aim to procuring the best and most satisfactory settlement of the question upon such a basis as may be open. These are the arguments which I have thought it necessary to lay before the Committee in respect to the reasons for this Resolution; but I will also take the liberty—and I am quite sure I am now speaking for my right hon. Friends, and, indeed, for this side of the House generally, as well as for myself—of asking hon. Gentlemen opposite to believe that, in making this proposal, we do so with a firm conviction that it will not entail any serious practical inconvenience in regard to the government, the discipline, or the spiritual offices of the Irish Church as a religious community. This, however, I am bound to show, and I will do so in the course of two or three minutes. First of all, I admit there is a presumption of in-

Mr. Gladstone

Parliamentary discussion a little later or a little sooner. My point is that no inconvenience of a serious or severe character will arise from this suspension during the period that I name. The suspension extends to episcopal appointments, to capitular appointments—which in Ireland are commonly called “sinecures,” though I do not use the term, because it is capable of an invidious interpretation—and lastly to all such parochial appointments as are not in private patronage. It may be asked why I leave out the cases of private patronage and incur a great inconvenience by the creation of new vested interests as far as benefices in private patronage are concerned. My answer is this—The benefices in private patronage are comparatively few in Ireland, though they are very numerous in England. In a long list which I have here of the most remarkable cases with respect to the anomalies to which I lately referred, the name of a private patron occurs in a long column but thrice, Crown occurs as patron six or seven times in the same column, and all the rest of the livings are in the hands of the Bishops. The bulk—at any rate, the large proportion—of the appointments, are in the hands of the Bishops. Now, were I to attempt to deal by means of a Suspensory Bill with benefices in private patronage in Ireland, I should immediately come across the question of injury to proprietary rights; and it is quite plain, I think, on sound principles of general policy, that we ought not to touch those proprietary rights at all until they are BER: Of

hon. Gen
the Bish am rig capable with th
however Bishop
Archb
bisho subst
than th
althoug or pres
Bishop fellow-C have, if think, th practical such lay within fi present
the gene law. El ject, I a say that the spiri
present purpose to the te into the a provi
poralitie apiritual
the exis therefor
liament

cations, will enable us to make perfectly satisfactory arrangements for the discharge of duties which will include the cure of souls; and will be perfectly respectable and efficient as far as temporal provision is concerned, but which will not in any manner create a freehold, and thereby lead to a vested interest. I think the words used in the Church Temporalities Act are these—

“That, in certain cases where appointments to Benefices are to be suspended under the Act, it shall be in the power of the Commissioners, together with the Bishops, to appoint to the parish a curate, and to assign to the curate such moderate remuneration—‘moderate’ is the epithet used—such moderate remuneration and allowance as shall seem becoming.”

Now, I think that, in a case of this kind there is no reason at all why a person appointed to a provisional and temporary charge should be placed in the position of a mere curate as far as emolument is concerned. It may be very proper for the stipend to be small in cases where the parishioners are very few and the duties chiefly ceremonial. But in all parishes where there is real and extensive work to be done, I think the workman who comes to do it is entitled to fair remuneration, and the Bill I shall propose, if it be my duty to bring in such a Bill, will contain a provision allowing of an adequate remuneration, so that the Bishop and the Commissioners shall not deem themselves to be bound by the scale of pay generally given to curates. Under these circumstances I submit that the small amount of inconvenience which can arise under the plan which I have sketched out in principle in the Resolutions before the House is as nothing compared with the greater objects we have in view. I may be asked, perhaps, whether I have a precedent for this course of procedure. Well, Sir, I have a precedent for it as far as any circumstances in which Parliament has ever been placed could by possibility afford a precedent. Parliament has never been called upon before to deal prospectively, as it is now called upon to deal, with a great mass of absolute freehold interests; but it has been called upon to deal with interests which approximate in their character to freehold interests—namely, with the vested interests acquired by public officers in offices held during good behaviour. And when there has been a case in which legislation affecting such offices has been contemplated, and when at the same time for any reason it has been necessary to postpone either the whole or part of such legislation, Parliament has wisely provided against the growth of vested interests, properly so called. The principal example of this is the Act 6 & 7 Will. IV., c. 77, which was to carry into effect the recommendations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England; and the 25th section provided that, in case the office of Judge, registrar, or other officer of the Ecclesiastical Courts became vacant during a period prospective, but defined by the Act, the person who might be appointed to such office—

“Should accept and take it subject to all the regulations and alterations affecting the same which might be afterwards made and provided by and under the authority of Parliament, and should not by his appointment acquire any vested interest in such office, or any title to compensation in respect thereof.”

I think it is evident we could not allow the existing law to confirm freeholds, and afterwards deprive parties of them even upon conditions, or even with compensation; that is a proceeding I should be slow to recommend. I think the plain and simple course is that the law should step in and intercept the creation of any freehold interests from this time. Although I do not say the precedent I have quoted is upon all fours with the case before the Committee, I think it is one which in substance supports the recommendation I make. I said I would confine myself to points of a practical character. I think I have sufficiently stated the object of this Resolution, and the grounds on which I recommend it; and I hope that it will be accepted by the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution as follows:—

“2. That, subject to the foregoing considerations, it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage, and to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity, or such as involve individual rights, pending the final decision of Parliament.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I will follow the example of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, both in the brevity of my remarks and in the freedom from any acerbity which he has displayed on the present occasion. But I wish to explain in a very few words the position of the Government with respect to the Resolution now before the Committee. The two sides of the House appear to me to have totally different objects in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman and his Friends desire to disestablish and disendow the Irish Church; and the Government and its supporters wish to deal with abuses which may exist in the Irish Church with a view to insuring its efficiency and its permanence. That being so, of course we cannot give our assent to this Resolution. We admit that, upon the first Resolution, we have suffered possibly as great a defeat as we could expect to suffer upon a question of this kind; and, although I think there are many objections which might be taken in detail to some parts of these Resolutions, I would rather say at once, with a view to bringing to an end the business of the Session, as we have professed our wish and intention to do, that it is not desirable we should protract the discussion upon them; but it must be distinctly understood that the Government give no assent to these Resolutions and do not assent to the Bill which is to be founded upon them. The course they may think proper to take upon it will not be declared until the Bill is before the House. It is not necessary until we see it to declare the manner in which we would deal with it. I will only remark that, in these Resolutions, it strikes me there is a reservation or rather a restriction put upon the Church in Ireland which is not put upon other persons or other bodies in that country. As I understand, if these Resolutions are carried into effect by legislation there is no intention to apply the same rule which is applied to the Established Church to other bodies also. I do not observe that there is anything in these Resolutions to restrict the appointment of any new professor at Maynooth, or to restrict any further gifts under the Regium Donum. This, however, is a matter on which I need not dwell now; I merely remark it in passing. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, that he has taken the correct course in asking for legislative sanction for the object he has in view. I quite agree also in the statement the right hon. Gentleman has made—I could not have stated it in stronger language myself—that it would be the duty of those who have the patronage—the public patronage—in their hands not to be guided by the Resolution of one House of Parliament, but only by an Act that had been passed by both Houses and had received the sanction of the Crown. That was the observation of the right hon. Gentleman, and it was a perfectly just one, and shows that he is not attempting in any way to over-ride, by the action of one House, those who have reposed in them the duties as well as the rights of patronage. Therefore, on the part of the Government, I recommend that there should be no division taken upon these Resolutions, and that we should meet them with a simple negative, without putting the House to the trouble of dividing.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he admitted that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire was necessary in order to relieve him from the imputation of attempting to legislate by means of the House of Commons, without consulting the House of Lords. If the right hon. Gentleman succeeded in passing the Bill founded upon the Resolutions, the result would be to forestall the action of the next Parliament, by imposing upon it the duty of repealing a statute, passed by the present Parliament, nominally temporary in its character. The Bill which had been foreshadowed would involve the principle of rendering the tenure of those clergy who would do the duty of the incumbencies affected by the Bill temporary, and would establish a precedent in part of the United Church dangerous to the freehold tenures of the incumbents of the Church in England. This principle was that of a clergy salaried by the State, holding their functions and cures at the pleasure of the Government. Such is the position of the curés in France; and to that position the principle of the Bill would, if used as a precedent, reduce the position of the clergy of the Established Church. The present movement was owing to the action of Dr. Cullen and Dr. Manning, the latter of whom, in the introduction to the second edition of his work entitled Essays on Religion and Literature, published by Longman in 1847, wrote in the same sense in which, in 1859, previous to his elevation by the Pope, he preached that the task of the Papal Church in this country was “to subdue and to subjugate an Imperial (meaning the English) race.” The passage was as follows:—

“Now, I have made the remarks as a ground for the assertion with which I shall conclude. The return to faith, which we have traced from the middle of the last century—that is, for now about a hundred years—steadily ascending, doctrine after doctrine, first within the Anglican Establishment, then reaching beyond it into the regions of antiquity and of Catholic truth, has now received its complement in the full re-entrance of the Catholic Church, and the authority of the Vicar of Jesus Christ. It is no longer a question of fragmentary doctrines or isolated truths; of a little more or a little less of this devotion or that opinion, but of the whole Catholic faith upon the principle of Divine certainty and of Divine authority through the Church and in its head. And it is visibly providential that at this moment the supremacy of the Crown, which is the Reformation in concreto, has literally come to nought. . . The Providence of God has poured shame and confusion on the Tudor statutes. The Royal supremacy has perished by the law of mortality which consumes all earthly things. And, at this period of our history, the supremacy of the Vicar of Jesus Christ re-enters as full of life as when Henry VIII. resisted Clement VII., and Elizabeth withstood St. Plus V. The undying authority of the Holy See is once more an active power in England; the shadow of Peter has fallen again upon it."

He begged pardon of the House for thus detaining them; but he saw the Liberal party of England thus opposing themselves in feeling and action to the Liberals of the rest of the world, inasmuch as they were accepting a policy dictated from the Vatican; and he hoped that his hon. Friends whom he saw opposite would excuse him if he warned them that they were entering upon a dangerous course.

MR. WHALLEY wished to say, in answer to the appeal of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, that speaking for himself, and for, he believed, the Liberal party, his vote was given against the Church of Ireland because it had not done its duty on the subject-matters to which the hon. Gentleman referred; and he was prepared and anxious to record a like vote against the Church of England, believing that, while it was established and endowed to resist Popery, it had, in the words of the Prime Minister, been long in secret combination and was now in open confederacy with that power.

SIR FREDERICK HEYGATE said, he could not allow this Resolution to pass without recording his protest with regard to what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) said about the Irish Bishops; he must say he thought it was rather unfair to quote the authority of one Irish Bishop and to take no notice of the opposite authority of all the other Bishops. Mr. Spurgeon, at a recent meeting, said that, if the Irish clergymen were turned into the streets to-morrow, it would only be an act of stern justice, avenging the past; and added that the object in view in this movement was the disestablishment of all Churches. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to assume that vacant parishes might easily be supplied by curates; but he must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that, for a number of years past, there had been a great difficulty in obtaining curates; and, if the ordinary inducements to their profession were to be withdrawn from them, very few of those gentlemen would remain in the country; and he was afraid the result would be that many of the parishes would be left altogether destitute. He had only to say further that he thought the Government had done wisely in declining those discussions, which were not upon the merits of the question, but were political discussions and intended for a political result. ["No, no!"] It was right in such a case not to go on dividing; but he hoped the day was not far distant when there would be a different result.

Question put, and agreed to.

2. Resolved, That, subject to the foregoing considerations, it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage, and to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity, or such as involve individual rights, pending the final decision of Parliament.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. GLADSTONE: I am only anxious, in proposing the third Resolution, to explain what is a point of form, but, at the same time, a point of form by no means unimportant. I am aware, and many Members of the House must be aware, that, according to the rules of the House of Commons, it would be competent to a Member to introduce into the House, with leave from the House, a Bill which might affect the rights of the Crown without the previous Assent of the Crown having been obtained. Such things have been done on certain occasions by a Government when it has happened, from the smallness of the subject-matter or from inadvertence, that notice has not been taken of the fact previous to the introduction of the Bill; and, again, Bills of that nature have been introduced by individuals not belonging to the Government, even when they were Bills to which the Government did not assent, and have been passed through certain of their stages without the giving of that Assent on the part of the Crown—it always being understood, however, that neither this House nor the House of Lords would ever consent to pass the Bill, or to part with it, until, at one of its stages, that Assent had been received. But, Sir, in this instance, the case is different. The interest of the Crown is in this case not merely a proprietary interest, but one of wide and far-reaching import; and also this is a Bill which, although it is not proposed by the Government, would be, I may say, proposed on behalf of a very large proportion of the Members of this House, acting together generally in its support. Now, that being so, I have felt, with the advice and concurrence of others, that it was my duty not to claim the entire liberty which the House has accorded to its Members; but to ask the House to present an Address requesting the Assent of the Crown, and allowing us to deliberate upon this subject before any Motion be made in the House for the introduction of the Bill. I should have been very sorry to set in my own person the precedent of one who, acting in any manner on behalf of a party in this House, endeavours to force a discussion on a Bill involving very important rights of the Crown without having had the Assent of the Crown previously obtained to the introduction of the Bill, though precedents in abundance might be found for such a course. I wish to make that explanation; but I need not trouble the Committee on other points, because the Resolution is simply consequent on the second Resolution. The Members of Her Majesty's Government are perhaps aware, and other Members of the House may be also, that in substance the words of this third Resolution are taken from the Church Temporalities Act of 1833—

“Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishopsrics, Bishoprics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof.”

The only difference is that in the Church Temporalities Act the words only include certain of the bishoprics and the archbishoprics. I have never understood why, because other temporalities were affected, though not extinguished by the Act. But here I think it is better to request the Assent of the Crown with respect also to benefices and dignities, including everything which it is possible to bring within the scope of the Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by proposing—

“3. That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present Session, the creation of new personal interests through the exercise of any public patronage, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishopsrics, Bishoprics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof.”—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. LEFROY said, that as representing a constituency including a large number of the members of the Irish branch of the United Church, he could not allow this Resolution to pass without observation. At the same time he would imitate the wise and dignified conduct of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and meet it with a negative. If he could by any means prevent that Resolution from passing he did not hesitate to say that he would persevere to the utmost. But he candidly confessed that the opinion of the House had been so fully expressed by the majority that it would be a vain effort to continue the opposition. He thought they would rather weaken than strengthen their case by doing so. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department had, however, clearly stated the only terms on which the sense of the House was not taken by a division on that occasion. He would, therefore, reserve his opposition for a future day, and would content himself for the present with a protest. He would only advert to one observation of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, who had quoted the gross revenues of certain parishes in Ireland. The amount certainly surprised him (Mr. Lefroy); but all he could say was that they must be subject to very heavy charges; for he was certain that the net amount of these parishes would equally surprise the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that this was one of the most important and solemn occasions on which the Crown could exercise its functions; and he wanted to know, whether it was to be taken for granted that Her Majesty's answer to the Address must be favourable, or whether she might not return such a reply as she might think proper? Referring to what had been said on a previous occasion, that Mr. Pitt had dissolved in 1784, when he had been beaten by a majority of 1, the hon. Gentleman pointed out that it was not until Mr. Pitt had been beaten several times, and the majorities against him had dwindled down from 59 to 1, that he had dissolved, and he did so then because the mind of the country was prepared to respond to his appeal. He wished to know what there was to prevent the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government from doing the same? He called upon the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, and also the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, to say, whether they thought the Assent of the Crown to the Address a mere matter of form; or whether, having protested against the introduction of the name of the Sovereign into the debate, they were now by a combination of both sides to prevent Her Majesty from exercising an independent judgment on this eventful occasion?

Mr. Gladstone

MR. DISRAELI: It is unnecessary for me to make any statement to the Committee; but in consequence of the inquiry of my hon. Friend, who has just addressed us, I must say that I do not think there was any assumption on the part of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire as to the character of the answer he will receive, or whether he will receive any answer at all to that Address. What I understood the right hon. Gentleman to do was this—to propose certain Resolutions, one of which was an Address to the Crown. When these Resolutions have been properly passed they will be dealt with after due consideration by the Government, and Her Majesty will be properly advised with respect to them.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman has represented me with perfect truth. I adverted to the liberty which, as I said, the House frequently gives to its Members, but which I did not, I added, intend to claim; but I never made any assumption whatever as to the particular nature of the advice which the Government might think it proper to give to Her Majesty, or as to the answer which the Crown might give to the Address, and it would have been highly improper had I done so.

Question put, and agreed to.

3. Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present Session, the creation of new personal interests through the exercise of any public patronage, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishoprics, Bishoprics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. LAING rose to move the following Resolution:—

“That this House is of opinion, that while the principle of disestablishing the Irish Church has been affirmed by this House, the question is too important to be settled without an appeal to the constituencies created by the new Reform Acts; and therefore that it will be the duty of the Government to arrange the course of Public Business so as to enable this appeal to be made at the earliest practicable opportunity.”

The hon. Member said, he did not intend to trouble the Committee by dividing, because the course of events had brought about the exact state of things which it was the object of his Motion to produce.

He understood the position of affairs to be this—Her Majesty's Government proposed to wind up the Business of the Session as early as possible, with a view to bring about a dissolution under the new constituencies, and with regard to the Scotch and Irish Reform Bills, to leave the same liberty to the House which had been left to it in the case of the English Reform-Bill of last year; but that, with the exception of those Bills, the ordinary business only of the Session would be brought forward. It was for the Leaders on both sides, under such an arrangement, to see that the business should be wound up so as to enable an appeal to be made to the new constituencies in October or November next at the latest. But, if it was the opinion of the Opposition that there was any constitutional objection to such a line of action, then it would be their duty to propose a Vote of Want of Confidence, which, if carried, would lead to an immediate dissolution. He had a very strong opinion, which was shared by many hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House, that the former course would be the most desirable. As far as he could form an opinion, the country was in favour of the decision come to by the House, and he believed that an appeal to the new constituencies would result in a large majority for disestablishment; but he should be sorry if an impression went forth that the question had been perverted to party objects, and that fair play had not been given to the Government in order to facilitate their recourse to that appeal. It was very desirable, moreover, that two General Elections should not occur within a very short period; and he believed that if the new constituencies decided unmistakably against the Irish Church, the more reasonable portion of the Conservative party would acquiesce in that decision. He could adduce other reasons for the course he had suggested; but there were occasions when the objects in view were promoted rather by silence than by speech, and he should be sorry to say anything which might revive those angry feelings which had happily to a great extent subsided. He wished, therefore, to withdraw his Resolution, trusting that calm reflection would lead to the adoption of the course it proposed.

MR. AYTOUN, in rising to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice, said, he had voted in favour of the Resolutions, and hoped they would tend to the pacification of Ireland; but he must say that considerable doubt existed throughout the country whether any portion of the secularized revenues of the Irish Church was to be given to support the Roman Catholic religion. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had declined to enter into details as to the application of those revenues, and he was no doubt perfectly justified in giving that answer; but people out-of-doors were naturally anxious to know what course would be adopted by the right hon. Gentleman and his Friends in the event of their accession to Office. There might, at least, be an assurance given as to what was not intended to be done with these funds; but the right hon. Gentleman had said nothing to preclude the notion of their application to the furtherance of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland. An influential meeting had been held at the Tabernacle, under the presidency of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), in favour of the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions, and at that meeting a letter, addressed to the chairman by Mr. Spurgeon, was read, containing the following passage:—

"The one point about which the Dissenters of England have any fear is one which I trust you will mention to-night. We fear lest any share of the Church property should be given to the Papists. To a man we should deprecate this. Bad as the present evil is, we would sooner see it let alone than see Popery endowed with the national property. Not one single farthing ought any religious denomination to receive, and the whole matter will be imperilled if those in power are not quite clear as to any douceurs to the Pope. We are not agitated by the dead horse of 'No Popery,' which knaves would raise that fools may be their instruments; but we are very determined that it never shall be said that, under the guise of removing the grievances of Ireland, we made an exchange of endowed Churches, and put down the Anglican to set up the Roman image."

Mr. Spurgeon, who was likely to be a fair judge of the feelings of English Dissenters, believed the whole matter would be imperilled "if those in power are not quite clear as to any douceurs to the Pope." The House, however, did not give the assurance requested, and since, in one of his speeches, he had recommended that the glebes and glebe houses should be retained by the Protestant clergy, he must have contemplated the possibility of some equivalent to the Roman Catholics. The principle of religious equality on which this movement was based would manifestly be violated if the Episcopalians retained these endowments while the Roman Catholic priests received no equivalent. He was not saying whether any particular course would be right or wrong; but he thought it essential that no doubt should exist as to what would be done. He would leave the English Members to speak for themselves; but the people of Scotland were most strenuously opposed to any endowment of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, either in the shape of grants to Maynooth or to Roman Catholic schools or Universities in Ireland. The Roman Catholic body in Ireland were to a great extent Ultramontane, and Ultramontanism was altogether opposed to the feelings of the great mass of the people of England and Scotland. So long, therefore, as Ultramontanism existed in its present state in Ireland, it would form a political barrier to the union of the people of Great Britain and Ireland. He believed that the peculiar nature of the priesthood educated at Maynooth College had greatly developed the Ultramontane feeling in Ireland. There was not a more powerful priesthood in Europe; for they were mostly drawn from the lower classes of the people, and their power was thereby greatly increased. He felt confident that the people of Scotland would withhold their support from any Government which intended under any shape or form to give a grant to Maynooth, either in the nature of an allowance from the Consolidated Fund, or any sum by way of the capitalization of the Irish Church property. With regard to Roman Catholic denominational education, one Member of the Government stated that he approved it, and although in the late Government the then Secretary for Ireland said that no charter for a Roman Catholic University would be granted without giving the House an opportunity of expressing an opinion upon it, yet such a charter was, in fact, granted. His Resolution, upon which he should venture to take the sense of the House, would be good against any misunderstanding of this kind. The question embraced by his Resolution was of the greatest importance, and it was desirable it should be settled as speedily as possible. As a necessary means to such a settlement he trusted that the House would receive a definite assurance from the Government that they would not appropriate any portion of the property of the Irish Church to denominational education.

Mr. Aytoun

MR. LAMONT, in seconding the Resolution, said, that if he had thought there would be the slightest hesitation or difficulty on the part of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) in assenting to this Resolution, he should have voted against the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That when the Anglican Church in Ireland is disestablished and disendowed, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued; and that no part of the secularized funds of the Anglican Church, or any State funds whatever, be applied in any way, or under any form, to the endowment or furtherance of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland, or to the establishment or maintenance of Roman Catholic denominational schools or colleges.—(Mr. Sinclair Aytoun.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) said, he had attentively listened to the speeches made during the Irish Church debate by Members representing Irish constituencies, and he had not heard from them a single disclaimer of the Maynooth Grant, or an expression of willingness on the part of the Irish Roman Catholic Church to give up that endowment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that, previous to the first division on the Resolutions for disestablishing and disendowing the Irish Church, he had objected to the idea of appropriating any portion of the property of the Irish Church to the purposes of any other religious denomination whatsoever. He (Mr. Newdegate) believed that a very long and wide latitude ought to be given to the first word of the Resolution "when" the Church is disestablished; the hon. Member was, however, looking to an eventuality, which he was compelled to contemplate, and deserved great credit for his foresight. As he (Mr. Newdegate) was obliged also to look forward to that eventuality, he could not refuse to support the Amendment, if the hon. Member should press it to a division. The anticipation of the hon. Member, that some portion of the property of the Church would be sought by the Roman Catholic hierarchy was perfectly reasonable, because in a published letter, Dr. Moriarty had distinctly stated that some of the funds ought to be applied to schools, the erection of churches, and various other purposes of the Church of Rome; while the same expectation was elaborately set forth in the last number of The Dublin Review, in a most remarkable article headed "The Case of Ireland before Parliament." He thought the hon. Member was justified in meeting, as far as possible by anticipation, expectations of that kind. But if he (Mr. Newdegate) were asked whether the protest made by the Amendment would be effectual if the disendowment was carried? he must say that he did not think it would, because the power which actuated the majority of the House to disestablish the Protestant Church in Ireland would be sufficient to endow all denominations, the Papal included, after the disestablishment had taken place. He had deprecated the idea of chartering and endowing a University in Ireland. The Dublin Review approved of the policy of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, and attributed his conduct entirely to the apprehension with which the Fenian outbreak had inspired him; and that article, emanating from the most Ultramontane publication in Ireland, closed with a distinct claim to endowment for the Roman Catholic University, after it was chartered, which the Roman Catholic hierarchy, who patronized The Dublin Review, expected as the inevitable consequence of the course which the House had taken, supposing, of course—which he (Mr. Newdegate) thought a very erroneous supposition—that the Reformed Parliament would confirm the declaration of the present House of Commons. Seeing, then, that that expectation and claim had been put in already on the authority of the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland—although he did not believe that this country would sanction the disestablishment and disendowment of our religion in Ireland—he should certainly divide with the hon. Gentleman, if he went to a division. He felt convinced that, if the Church of Ireland was disendowed, the power and influence which now commanded the Liberal party would most surely carry out the anticipations expressed by Dr. Moriarty, and in the last number of The Dublin Review, that some portion of the funds which were to be wrested from the Protestant religion would be appropriated to the purpose of the Roman Catholic hierarchy.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to know, whether, in point of form, practice, and usage, when they were in Committee on the Established Church of Ireland, they could suddenly convert themselves into a Committee upon the Presbyterian or Roman Catholic Church in Ireland? The Resolutions which they had gone into Committee to consider were limited to the Irish Established Church; and he should like to know, whether it was regular for that Committee to take up Resolutions relating to a totally different subject? If any hon. Member desired to consider the position of the Roman Catholic Church or of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, it would be much more convenient to move for a Committee on the particular Church he wished to refer to ["Oh, oh!"], and they could then consider whether any legislation was necessary with regard to that Church. Whatever might be the decision of the Chairman on the point he had raised, he, himself, would vote against this Resolution, as he would vote for the Previous Question, on the ground that it was quite irrelevant to the subject before the Committee.

MR. WHALLEY rose to order. The hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets had risen to a point of Order, but had departed from that, and was explaining what he would do, in spite of any decision which the Chairman might give on the question he had raised.

MR. AYRTON said, the hon. Gentleman was not quite accurate. He had not risen to a point of Order, but because, the previous speaker having concluded, an opportunity was afforded him to address the Committee. It was true he had intimated his wish to ask the Chairman's opinion whether the course now being pursued was usual? but, to save the Committee the inconvenience of his rising again, he had gone on to say, before he was interrupted, that, whatever might be the Chairman's decision on the order of proceeding, he would object, as an individual, to enter into the discussion of a question which he thought irrelevant to the main purposes of that Committee. He would, therefore, vote against the Resolution without desiring to express any opinion on its subject.

MR. ROEBUCK wished to say, before the Chairman rose to answer the question put to him, that the question they were then discussing was the disendowment as well as the disestablishment—because the two things could not be separated—of the Irish Church. Well, what would weigh very much in the minds of a number of men in determining that question was the after applications of the funds to be obtained by the process of disendowment, and to say that point was not relevant to the question seemed to him to be wholly to misunderstand the great subject of the present discussion.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, he was rather surprised at the objection taken by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets. Although himself not so skilled in the rules of the House as that hon. Gentleman, who was also, no doubt, more acquainted with the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and much more in that right hon. Gentleman's counsels than he had been, and who, probably, had a place already carved out for him in any new Administration, still, he thought, it was very natural they should have a distinct understanding as to what they were going to do in the matter. Unless he had understood the right hon. Member for South Lancashire to say undisguisedly that none of those funds were to be applied to the Roman Catholic Church, he would not have voted with him. It was highly important they should enter into that subject at once; and if a Standing Order stood in the way, as suggested by the special pleading of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, it should be set aside for that purpose. They ought not to proceed further, in regard to the Bill that was about to be brought in without, having a distinct understanding on that question. The people of England, he believed, were opposed to giving the money of the Irish Church to increase the Regium Donum; and he felt sure they would rise as one man against the proposal of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire, if in disendowing the Irish Establishment, they were going to endow the Roman Catholic Church.

Mr. Ayrton

THE CHAIRMAN, as to the point of Order raised by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, must remind the Committee that, by the Order of the House, they were then in Committee on the Acts relating to the Irish Church, and therefore they were not in Committee on the Acts relating either to Maynooth or the Regium Donum. The Resolution moved by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) referred, mainly, to the Anglican Church in Ireland, and the application of the funds belonging to that Church in the event of its being disestablished and disendowed; and therefore the Resolution, as a whole, seemed to him sufficiently within the terms of the Reference to the Committee to enable the Committee to entertain it. Such part of it as related to the Anglican Church in Ireland and the application of its funds was plainly within the Order of Reference to the Committee.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I wish to make this observation in regard to this Resolution, that it is one of a very different character—I am not now expressing an opinion as to what it proposes to effect—from those which have already been agreed to by the Committee. The three Resolutions which have already been agreed to were necessary for the purpose of laying the foundations of a measure which it is hoped the House will pass during the present Session. Therefore, there was nothing in them that was of the nature of an abstract Resolution; and nothing that pretended in any way to bind Parliament or any parties hereafter. Now, the present Resolution is of a different character; because it has nothing whatever to do, and can have nothing whatever to do, with the Bill which it is understood is about to be introduced into the House. It has this great objection, that although it may express the opinion of this House as to what should be done at some future time, yet as a General Election usually leaves out about 200 Members who had sat in the previous Parliament, and a new Parliament is a body of Gentlemen often of different sentiments and acting from different motives, and often under a different set of circumstances from the one that preceded it, there seems to me no use whatever, as regards any purpose of legislation, in passing the Resolution just moved by the hon Gentleman behind me. To the first part of the Resolution, as far as the word “discontinued,” I presume everybody in the House would agree; because it has been stated over and over again, in the course of these discussions, that if the Irish Church were disestablished, the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum would be withdrawn. That is a matter about which I presume there should be no question and no dispute whatever. But I object to the words in the latter part of the Resolution, because they purport to bind the Committee to what, in my opinion, it is quite impossible for the Committee to bind itself to. I ask hon. Gentlemen, if they have read the clause, just to read the latter part of it again. It says—

“And that no part of the secularized funds of the Anglican Church, or any State funds whatever, be applied”—mark the words—“in any way, or under any form, to the endowment or furtherance of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland, or to the establishment or maintenance of Roman Catholic denominational schools or colleges.”

Well, but seeing that you have in England a system of education almost altogether denominational, and also seeing that there is a system that I do not approve of, and never have approved of, but which still exists, and has been sanctioned by Parliament for thirty years, the hon. Gentleman wishes the next Parliament to decide that that system is wholly inapplicable to Ireland. You have adopted that system in Ireland, and practically your system must be denominational to a large extent; because in three-fourths of the country, or more than one-half, at least, the schools being in districts where there is no population but a Roman Catholic population, must, as a matter of course, be denominational. But then if you pass this Resolution, the result would be this—no, there would be no result whatever; I am quite in error, because no future Parliament would feel itself bound in the slightest degree by this Resolution. We are not about to legislate upon it. We are merely asked to pass this Resolution for the purpose of expressing the opinion of hon. Gentlemen who happen to be sitting in the House this evening. But it might be that, in a future Parliament, my hon. Friend, or some other person, might refer to this Resolution as a kind of pledge which Parliament had passed and agreed to. Of course a future Parliament would not care a single farthing about a Resolution of this nature which had been proposed in a previous Parliament. I therefore put it to the hon. Gentleman who has moved the Resolution that he should stop at the word “discontinued.” After the repeated declarations which have been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire there is no necessity for adopting the first part of the Resolution. But with regard to the latter part of the Resolution, I, for one, could not give it my support, and if it is put to the vote I shall certainly divide against it, and on the grounds, that, first of all, it has no reference to any legislation which is proposed to be introduced during the present Session; and secondly, that I will not have my hands, or my vote, or my voice tied up against any proposition that may be made hereafter for assisting schools for general education in Ireland, which may be, and I believe must practically be in a large portion of that country denominational schools, and to which denominational schools this clause strongly and emphatically objects. On these grounds I shall vote against the latter part of the Resolution, while to the first I have no objection to offer except that it is unnecessary.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON said, the Committee had now to deal with some of the evils of the recent precipitate Resolutions; for upon the first occasion of a supporter of the right hon. Member for South Lancashire proposing a Resolution, which was its natural consequence, he was told by his friends that it was ill-timed, inconvenient, and useless, so far as it regarded the future. He had taken no part in the debates on the three Resolutions, not because he did not regard the question as being of paramount importance, nor because his constituents did not take great interest in it, but because — seeing his way so little into the future — he was unwilling to offer opinions which must necessarily be crude, and which he might hereafter deem it to be his duty to modify. But when the House was told, a sit had been by the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, that a Resolution dealing with the branch of the subject immediately under its consideration was useless and ill-timed, he should like to be informed how it was more useless or ill-timed than those other Resolutions which had already been pressed upon their acceptance? It was clear, he thought, after the speech of the hon. Member (Mr. Bright), that the consideration of those Resolutions had been so pressed from party motives — [“ Oh, oh ! ”] — and not because the House was in a position to deal with the question with advantage. He did not for a moment believe that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, in taking the course which he had pursued, was not acting from most sincere conviction, and with an earnest desire to remove all causes of discontent in Ireland. But he could not help thinking that advantage had been taken of the state of things which unhappily prevailed in that country to press the question forward at a time when Parliament could not legislate upon it. The consequence was, that, instead of being content with taking the opinion of the House on the eve of a dissolution, he had gone further, and sought to pledge the House to steps of which he and his followers could not see the legitimate consequence. And now he would ask how the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland was likely to be affected by those proceedings? The Committee had expressed its opinion in reference to the patronage of the Crown in Ireland, and now they were told that any attempt to say how the funds should be dealt with would be futile. The noble Earl who was the Leader of the Opposition in the other House, giving up the plan which he first proposed with respect to the disposal of the revenues of the Irish Church, was now in favour of the proposal that there should be no endowments at all in that country. That being the deliberate opinion of the noble Earl and his followers, how, he would ask, could they refuse to support the Motion of his hon. Friend opposite, who contended that the necessary sequence of the disendowment of the Established Church must be the withdrawal of all State aid from the Roman Catholic religion? The question was one, he might add, of the utmost interest to his constituents. He had altogether declined to join with those who sought to do away with the grant to Maynooth on the ground that the matter was settled; but now that it would seem that the endowments of the Established Church were about to be withdrawn, the question with regard to the Maynooth Grant would be re-opened. He would ask, how were they going to deal with Maynooth College? Were they going to give any of the proceeds of the Established Church to the Roman Catholics? That was a question which presented itself to him with great force, and it should be one of the questions to be considered by the Committee. He, for one, should not shrink from giving his vote in favour of his hon. Friend's Resolution should he press it to a division. Those who had lent their aid to rob the Irish Church were already quarrelling over the spoils; and he should, notwithstanding what had fallen from the hon. Member for Birmingham, vote as he had stated. Before he sat down, he desired to ask the Chairman, whether it would not be necessary, as it had been ruled that the Resolution could only refer to the Anglican Church and the application of its funds, to strike out the words, “ it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued; and that? ” The Resolution would then read —

Sir James Fergusson

“ That when the Anglican Church in Ireland is disestablished and disendowed, no part of the secularized funds of the Anglican Church be applied in any way, or under any form, to the endowment or furtherance of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland, or to the establishment or maintenance of Roman Catholic denominational schools or colleges.”

He should vote with the hon. Member who had moved the Resolution, with no intention of joining him in an attack upon the Roman Catholic Church; but only to be consistent to the principles he had always upheld, as well as to the Resolutions to which the House had been content to come.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he agreed with the hon. Baronet (Sir James Fergusson) that the present Resolution was a precipitate one, and an agreement with it would be attended with most embarrassing consequences. ["Oh, oh!"] The hon. Baronet, and those who supported it, were anxious that no State funds should be applied to the maintenance of the Roman Catholic religion, or of denominational schools; but the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) had shown that many of these now supported by public money were exclusively denominational; but this Resolution was not confined to Ireland. There were Roman Catholic schools in this country, and this Resolution, if agreed to, would affect them, and it would tie up the hands of the Government in regard to them. Further, it would affect the Roman Catholic chaplains in the army and the navy and the gaols, and, indeed, all cases in which public funds were applied to Roman Catholics. Seeing the embarrassment this Resolution would create in the cases of Roman Catholic chaplains of gaols and garrisons, he was surprised that any Member of the Government would support it. He trusted the Committee would not entertain it for a moment.

MR. FAWCETT rose to order. He wished to know whether, as a matter of Order, the words "State funds" must not be left out of the proposed Resolution? If they were left out it would relieve many hon. Gentlemen in coming to a conclusion.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked whether, in the event of the Irish Church being disendowed, the proceeds of the endowments would not lapse to the Crown? because, in that event, they would be State funds.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, he could not vote for the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Aytoun) as it stood. If the Resolution were affirmed and carried out by Parliament, and the Irish Church disestablished and disendowed, they should lose the Irish Church as an Establishment, without gaining the only advantage which those who were in favour of the proposal said they would obtain from it. If money were settled on the Anglican Church in Ireland, independently of State interference, and they bound themselves under no circumstances whatever not to extend the same principle to other religions, the fate of the Irish Church would soon be followed by the disestablishment of the English Church.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Fawcett) rose, as he had a right, to a point of Order. He could only repeat what he had already stated. The Reference by the House to the Committee was, that the Committee should take into consideration the Acts relating to the Established Church in Ireland; and, therefore, the House was now in Committee not on the Act relating to Maynooth College, or on the Regium Donum, or State funds. At the same time the Resolution, as a whole, had reference to the application of the funds of the Anglican Church, in the event of its being disendowed, and incidentally dealt with Maynooth and the Regium Donum as a condition or consequence of such disendowment. He therefore could not say that the Resolution as a whole was, in consequence of its reference to Maynooth College and the Regium Donum, out of order, or that the words adverted to must necessarily, as a matter of Order, be omitted from the Resolution, in order to bring it within the terms of the Reference made by the House; but he again stated that the Reference made by the House related to the Acts concerning the Established Church in Ireland; and it was for the Committee to judge whether it was within the spirit of that Reference to enter into any discussion with respect to Maynooth, the Regium Donum, or the application of State funds; and whether the present was the convenient time or opportunity for doing so.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend who moved this Resolution (Mr. Aytoun), made an appeal to Her Majesty's Government which was not answered, and in consequence of that appeal I did not rise to address the House, because I did not consider that I am in a position which renders me principally responsible for the conduct of the business of the House. Though that may be so, yet I have undertaken, I must tell my hon. Friend, a very great responsibility in the face of the House and of the country. There is no man who will be more deeply disgraced than myself if, owing to any weakness, rashness, or cowardice on my part, this great undertaking should break down. But, on the other hand, my obligation extends to this point — carefully to separate myself, at whatever risk of misunderstanding, from any proceeding which appears to me deliberately to alter injuriously the due course and order in which, if we are to have any successful dealing with a question so great and complicated as this, we must necessarily approach its various parts, and all attempts of any Members to pledge the House before the proper time to opinions, however important, or however right, should fail to receive the support of the House, as being likely, as I think, to lead us into confusion. I therefore most humbly decline to be a party to such attempts. It appears to me most important that we should consider the great distinction between opinions enunciated, however solemnly, by Members of this House and the decisions of the House itself, whether in its ordinary form or in a Committee of the House. The order in which this matter presents itself to my mind is this—When I look to Ireland I see a great system of State endowment. I see that system interwoven with many social arrangements, possessed of great power, supported by the Ministers of the Crown, and carefully identified—most honestly, I have no doubt—by a large number of influential persons, with the interests of the Church of England. That being so, it appears to me to be the dictate of common sense that when you have arrived—when anyone has arrived at the conclusion that this great system of State endowment and Establishment should be brought to a close, he should very carefully consider the order of his proceedings. Now, in considering the order of these proceedings, I have not hesitated to touch the question of the grant to Maynooth, and have said explicitly that, in my opinion, the Maynooth Endowment Act must be repealed. I have also spoken explicitly with regard to the Regium Donum, and have said that, in my opinion, that must come to an end. I cannot blame myself for having dwelt too little on those matters, considering that the position I occupy is simply that of an Independent Member of Parliament, without official responsibility. Yet I have not, furthermore, hesitated to say that I am firmly convinced that this operation must include and involve as its basis the total cessation of any attempt to maintain an endowed or salaried Church or clergy in Ireland. That being so, I have not presumed to ask the Committee to vote upon such proposals as that contained in my hon. Friend's Resolution. I am compelled to look to the mode in which this House, having before it a very great and difficult enterprise, may most successfully make its approaches to the fortification it wishes to take. The Establishment as a fortification has been zealously defended, and we wish to take that fortification and to raze the Establishment to the ground. That being the case I have called upon the House, in the first instance, to take those matters which deal with the main principle primarily in hand. But the hon. Member (Mr. Aytoun) demands, and the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) who cheers him, demands to know completely what is to be done with all those important principles which shall arise in the consideration of this question.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. AYTOUN: I beg pardon. I demanded to know what was not to be done.

MR. GLADSTONE: I also beg pardon. But my hon. Friend distinctly stated at the close of his speech that he wished to know completely my views upon this question.

MR. AYTOUN: I beg to say that my right hon. Friend misunderstood me. It is quite possible I may have expressed myself in such a manner as to lead him to misinterpret me; but what I meant to say was that it is desirable we should have a complete issue before us. I do not mean that the details of the plan of the right hon. Gentleman should be made known; but that we should have a clear understanding as to whether or not any portion of the funds of the Anglican Church should be given to the Roman Catholic Church.

MR. GLADSTONE: My hon. Friend does not ask me to give a plan. In the place where I stand it is not competent for me to form one; it would be the height of rashness for me to do so. There is no grant at present that I know of to the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland, except that conveyed by the Maynooth Act, and that Act I have already said, in my opinion, must be repealed. My hon. Friend asks me—

“Whether it is part of my plan, as an equivalent to the glebes and glebe houses proposed by me to be reserved to the future incumbents of the Anglican Church, to give glebes and glebe houses, or any other equivalent, to the parish priests of the Roman Catholic communion?”

Why, Sir, I have never asked the House to vote that any glebes or any parsonage house or any church shall be reserved or given to any communion. The House remains totally uncommitted on that subject. When a proposal of that kind—with respect to which I have my own opinion—is made to the House, let it then consider whether that proposal will entail any proceedings with respect to the Presbyterians or the Roman Catholics which it deems objectionable, and if so, let it decline to give those churches or glebe houses to members of the Anglican communion. My hon. Friend appears to me to be taking a course adverse to the furtherance of his own views. The House has voted this, and this alone—First of all, that in our opinion, it is necessary that the English Church in Ireland should be disestablished, subject to a due regard to vested interests and proprietary rights. To that extent, and to that extent alone, the House has pledged itself. It has then gone on, by a second and third Resolution, to lay the basis for the introduction of a Suspensory Act. It is best that I should consider the Motion of my hon. Friend, first with regard to that part of it which you, Sir, have declared to be within the spirit of the rules which guide the Committee; and, secondly, with regard to that part of it which you have apparently intimated is not within the spirit of those rules. The first portion is that relating to the grant of Maynooth and the Regium Donum. Now, I am at a loss to know why these subjects can be brought within the jurisdiction of this Committee. It appears to me, looking at the regular order of the question, that the Secretary of State for the Home Department was perfectly in order when, in the course of his speech this evening, he observed that I had said nothing respecting the creation of new vested interests in connection with the College of Maynooth and the churches of the Presbyterians. The reason I said nothing on that subject will, I hope, be satisfactory to the right hon. Gentleman. I feel some difficulty as to the form in which cases of that kind can be dealt with by legislation, because there are no vested interests in either of those cases of a nature known to the law. But, I agree with the right hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend that both as regards the final arrangements and the Suspensory Act, the same principles ought to be applied first to the Established Church and then to the Regium Donum and to Maynooth. The only question now remaining for our consideration is in what manner it is most convenient to deal with the matter in detail, and that I hope to have time to consider. I presume my hon. Friend will be disposed to drop from the Resolution the matters that are not within the spirit of the rules that govern this Committee. I refer to that part of the Motion relating to Maynooth and the State funds. I apprehend that the Motion will then stand in this form—shall have been disestablished and disendowed, it is right and necessary that no part of the secularized funds of the Anglican Church be applied in any way, or under any form, to the endowment of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland, or to the establishment or maintenance of Roman Catholic denominational schools or colleges.”

“That when the Anglican Church in Ireland

The last proposition not being limited to Ireland at all. I cannot vote for the Resolution. It would, in my opinion, lead to great misapprehension. I have no intention whatever of circumventing the House; and if I have any proposal to make which is likely to go against the conscience of any man I shall take care that the proposal is clearly laid before him. I contend that this is a very solemn matter. We have not for years adopted words more historic than are those of these Resolutions, and they must be qualified to stand the test of the severest examination. I hope my hon. Friend will not think me hypercritical when I remark with reference to the opening phrase of his Motion that I have never used in these debates the word “disendowed,” and for well-considered reasons. If I had used it I am perfectly certain that in our debate upon the particulars of the plan we should be involved on every possible occasion in a dispute as to whether faith had been kept or not. There are some endowments of the Irish Church that have been given by individuals; still they are endowments in every sense of the word; they have become part of the national endowment. I would not give a pledge that will subject me to the taunt of any man; but if I were now to propose disendowment and afterwards to propose to leave untouched the endowments of Primate Robinson, Primate Boulter, or Lord Herbert, or any others who have given large sums to the Anglican Church, I should be justly open to the charge of having broken faith. I will not bind myself to take such endowments from the Church. I will use no ambiguous words, and these Resolutions which we have voted do not contain a syllable, as far as I know, which we shall be unable to fulfil in the spirit and in the letter. I am, therefore, not ready to vote for the Resolution of my hon. Friend. Then with respect to the opinion that parsonage houses as well as churches should be left in the possession of members of the Irish Church Establishment. Parsonage houses, I believe, in law are endowments. But I will not attempt to shut the door or limit the discussion of the House upon matters of this kind. If the price I am to pay for the position I am now assuming is to be misunderstood out-of-doors, I will cheerfully pay that price. I will accept no Resolution which pledges me to a course of conduct which I may afterwards be unable to carry out. The Resolution of my hon. Friend would pledge the Committee never to maintain a Roman Catholic denominational school in England. How, then, can he ask us to vote for it? Probably, my hon. Friend may wish to amend his Resolution, and say that he does not want to have any denominational schools supported in Ireland. Let me in all earnestness ask my hon. Friend whether he really feels so confident in his own legislative strength that he does not feel that we have got enough upon our hands at present? I am very sanguine with respect to this great question; but I am very certain of this—that a very few errors in the conduct of affairs, a very few innocent mistakes, will go far to prejudice all we have done. I will tell my hon. Friend explicitly one more conclusive reason why I will not vote for his Motion. I must leave to the hon. Baronet (Sir James Fergusson). I must leave it to any Gentleman, if such there be who sit with or behind Her Majesty's Ministers, to vote for it; I will not, as I never have voted for any Motion which selects from all forms of religion among my fellow-countrymen one particular form of religion and stigmatizes it by making it the subject of a special condemnation or special renunciation by Parliament. Disestablishment of the Church is what we have primarily in view; general disendowment as a rule and as an ultimate aim, with respect to bodies of religion in Ireland and without any odious distinction, must evidently follow, and is plainly involved in the plan. About this there can be no doubt; but no consideration of policy will induce me for one moment to take advantage of a particular state of feeling which may prevail on some of these Benches opposite, to purchase momentary favour by an act unjust to a portion of my fellow-countrymen, and which I feel to be incompatible with my position.

MR. J. HARDY hoped the Motion would be pressed to a division, in order that Independent Members on both sides of the House might express their opinions. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had not been quite fair to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun), because the pledge given was that none of the endowments of the Established Church should go to the Roman Church; not that no endowment was to go to the schools of Ireland. The whole proceeding foreshadowed what would come from the ill-advised Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman. For his part, one Resolution was as good as another. ["Oh!"] One was just as binding as the other. In somewhat vulgar phrase, "what was sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander." One of these Resolutions was objected to as binding the House to some particular course, it might be twelve months hence, yet three Resolutions at least equally binding had been passed without any similar objection. Those three mischievous Resolutions, as he ventured to call them, bearing the seeds of the dissolution of this House, and probably of a future House of Commons, were put forward as binding. Then let it not be said that the Resolution of the hon. Member opposite was in any way less efficacious. He knew that among the Scotch Members, at all events, if it had been supposed for a moment that any portion of the endowments of the Protestant Church of Ireland were to go to the Roman Catholic Church the majority on the Opposition side of the House would not have been nearly what it was. He only hoped that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy would not be mystified by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, but, having come forward as an Independent Member, he would give Members of the House an opportunity of giving an independent vote.

Mr. Gladstone.

MR. COGAN said, that, in the present position of the question, Members were in some difficulty, and probably the Liberal party were in a position of some danger. [Cheers.] That, of course, was gratifying to Members opposite, and the opportunity thus afforded to them had been eagerly turned to account. The speech of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Home Department (Sir James Fergusson) he presumed might be taken to some extent as indicating the course which the Government intended to take. The Government, he believed, were actuated by feelings much more intelligent than those of the hon. Member who had brought forward this Motion. They knew full well that this Motion was calculated to be of very material injury to the cause which the Opposition had at heart, and for that purpose, and that alone, the Motion was supported by Her Majesty's Government. He deeply regretted that a Motion attended with such effects should have proceeded from the Opposition Benches. It would have been much more in character and much more seemly if a Motion calculated to defeat, to weaken, and to injure the Liberal party had proceeded from the other side of the House. He had said that the Liberal party was in danger, and his reason was this — The position of the party would, indeed, be one of danger if they were to debase from the position of Leader the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire, and to erect in his stead the hon. Member the mover of this Motion. He appealed to Members of the Liberal party, he appealed to their common sense as Englishmen, anxious to carry this great question to a successful issue, to be guided by the wisdom, the courage, and the sterling honesty, of the right hon. Gentleman who had proved those qualities by many years' service. He appealed to them not to degrade themselves, or to justify the epithet but a few days ago applied to them by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. E. P. Bouverie), when he said that they presented the appearance of "a rabble." If those sitting on the Opposition side of the House were not prepared to act together as a party under the guidance of trusted Leaders, it was hopeless to look for the settlement of a question so difficult as this. And if any man, no matter how great or how small he might be, was to set himself up to guide the deliberations of a great party in carrying this question to a successful issue, and if a considerable number, or even any small number, sitting upon the Liberal side, so far forget the dictates of common sense — ["Oh, oh!"] — yes, he repeated it — they would be forgetting the dictates of common sense in forgetting the allegiance which was due to the gifted Member for South Lancashire, who had led them to so great a triumph as they had witnessed that evening. They had seen the second and third of his Resolutions carried in a triumphant manner, and the discomfited Government and the discomfited party opposite were afraid even to divide against them. With the prestige of victories like that, was it to be tolerated for one moment that any individual, for the purpose of gratifying his own peculiar opinions, was to come forward as an apple of discord into the ranks which without union could never be led to victory? He objected to the Motion on the broad ground that it was wrong to embarrass themselves with more than one question at a time, or to attempt to tie the hands of Parliament with regard to matters not immediately before it. Still, let him not be misunderstood.

As an Irish Catholic Member, he was not in any way offering an opinion in favour of the continuance of the Maynooth Grant or of the Regium Donum to the Presbytery of Ireland. And, in saying this, he was authorized to say that he did not speak for himself alone. He begged to declare for himself, and those whose sentiments he conveyed, that they fully recognized the necessity, when religious equality was established in Ireland, that the Maynooth Grant should cease to exist. They were prepared for it, and quite able to do without it. They were quite prepared, also, for the discontinuance of the Regium Donum; and he and they believed it would be a very small price to pay for securing the peace and prosperity of Ireland, and the establishment and maintenance of religious equality in that country.

MR. NEWDEGATE begged to compliment the hon. Member for Kildare (Mr. Cogan) upon the vigour with which he had applied the Papal thong to the party opposite. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun), who had moved the Amendment, was, however, a Scotchman, representing a Scotch constituency, and, however he might suffer under the infliction of the Papal thong, he (Mr. Newdegate) believed that he would persevere with his Amendment from a sense of duty. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire said — "I have declared that the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum shall cease. It is my will that all endowments shall cease, because I am unwilling that any denomination shall remain under the stigma of being unendowed." But the right hon. Gentleman refused to confirm these declarations by his vote; and then was it not a stigma on the Church of Ireland that she should not only be endowed but disendowed? The hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), who had said that the Resolution was objectionable because it prospectively bound the House, would excuse him (Mr. Newdegate) for saying that that was an objection which applied with no less force to the Resolutions which the Committee had adopted, and with still greater force to the Bill that was to be proposed. He hoped the hon. Member would adhere to his Motion, because, if he and others were to be bound by the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, they had a right to know what those Resolutions meant. On the first night of these debates he was confident that the Scotch Members and the reprerepresentatives of voluntary principle did not see the real bearing and intention of these Resolutions, and were not aware that in an authoritative publication, which had been the organ of Cardinal Wiseman, there was a distinct declaration that the Roman Catholics supported the Resolutions with the view of appropriating to themselves the funds of the Irish Church. He hoped that in justice to his constituents, to the Non-conformist body, and to the advocates of the voluntary system, the Member for Kirkcaldy would press his Motion to a division.

MR. CLAY presumed that it was impossible to find a subject on which both sides of the House would be in perfect accordance; but if there was one subject more than another on which Gentlemen opposite agreed with the Liberal party, it must be that if the Irish were disendowed the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum must follow. There were scarcely half a dozen Members who would controvert that proposition. If that were so, what purpose could be served by the Resolution of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) the first half of which was out of order, and the other half of which involved legislative difficulties so great as to be almost impossibilities? More than that, the Resolution would introduce difficulty and confusion in the great work which the House had set about. The Resolution would stand as an isolated insult to Roman Catholics.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he had no doubt that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy meant that his Resolution should be a supplement to the first Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman. He would venture to propose an Amendment on the hon. Gentleman's Resolution—that was to say, to leave out all the words of his Resolution after the word “that,” in order to add these words—

“When legislative effect shall have been given to the first Resolution of this Committee respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued.”

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the first word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “when legislative effect shall have been given to the first Resolution of this Committee respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued.”—(Mr. Whitbread.)

—instead thereof.

Mr. Neirdegato

COLONEL W. S. that Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN than once, in and been made to me not decide that a Maynooth, the other matters in upon the Resol Irish Church, and duties of this venture to point for the consider whether an Instru was within the sp by the House to ture to think, that the Amendment Bedford (Mr. Wh upon a Resolution be out of order, That Amendment of the inconveni Committee on th Irish Church, sub within the terms

MR. AYTOUN to withdraw his I was a difference among some of I to amend it by “or any State also the words the end of the I other words, so ally to “other the maintenance schools.”

THE CHAIRMAN hon. Member for I ment, the Questio became this—“I to be left out stan Until the opinio taken on that issa petent to the hor to move to amend tion.

MR. PIM said, Resolution and t was nothing abou larization in the House had adopte lelism between Established Chur nooth, so that the should depend on was a parallelism Donum; but the be compared, not the Established Church, but with the endowments for the education of the Protestant clergy in Trinity College.

MR. FAWCETT wished to know, whether it would be competent for the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, in the event of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) being lost, to alter his Resolution as he had proposed? The answer would probably affect the votes of many hon. Members, who might be inclined to support the Resolution in its altered form, though they were indisposed to agree to it as originally proposed.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question which has been put from the Chair is—"That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution." If this be affirmed, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy has no power to alter it.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Resolution."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 198: Majority 113.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'when legislative effect shall have been given to the First Resolution of this Committee respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued' be added,"

—instead thereof.

MR. LAMONT rose to move to add the following words:—

"And that no part of the secularized funds of the Anglican Church be applied in any way or in any form to the endowment or furtherance of the Roman Catholic religion or any other religious body in Ireland; or to the establishment or maintenance of any denominational schools or colleges."

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Question was, that the words moved by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) be here added. The hon. Member for Bute-shire (Mr. Lamont), however, has moved words which are substantially the same as the words of the original Resolution; therefore, the Question I have to put is, "That these words"—namely, the words moved by the hon. Member for Bedford—"be here added."

MR. GLADSTONE proposed to add a few words, which he believed would be accepted on all sides, "due regard being had to personal interests." He said it was with the greatest regret he had seen a Motion introduced, the subject-matter of which was of a kind to make it doubtful whether it were really within the spirit of the Reference to the Committee. In the most explicit manner he owned that it was to him quite a question for consideration whether it would not have been wiser to have reported Progress, and to have reported to the House the Resolutions passed in this Committee, and then had the Reference to the Committee on the Maynooth Grant framed in such a way that a Resolution like this might have been originally passed. He should not, however, press that point now. As to the Resolution itself, he could not object to what exactly corresponded with his own repeated declarations. It amounted to this. The Committee were dealing with a very great subject to which there were minor accessories, and the Resolution was simply to the effect that those minor accessories should be dealt with in the same manner as the main subject. He concluded by moving the addition of the words, "due regard being had to personal interests."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, by adding the words "due regard being had to all personal interests."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH wished to know the meaning of the words proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. The Resolution condemned the Maynooth Grant; but was it intended to continue that establishment in spite of the Resolution? Was Maynooth College, being a corporate body, to be kept up as long as the last Professor there happened to live? If so, he doubted very much whether the course proposed would meet the approval of the Scotch and Dissenting Members. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would make a clear explanation of the exact meaning of the Amendment.

MR. WHALLEY hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not insist upon the addition of the words, which would merely involve the whole question in doubt. He had voted on this question on the principle of fair play and "free trade;" and if the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was not going to prosecute his great work upon that principle, he had not suggested any other. The House and the country were waiting to know on what principle the measure was to be based; and the great difficulty of the right hon. Gentleman would be to induce the country to go much further with him until he had been more definite as to his intentions.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. WARREN) said, that the Committee, before accepting this Resolution, ought to insist upon having a clear notion of what its meaning was. Resolutions had been passed with, they were told, a view to legislation. He wished to know what legislation the right hon. Gentleman meant to found upon this Resolution. What were the existing personal interests which were to be preserved? Were they those of the professors and students at Maynooth? Was it, however, not a delusion to introduce these words into the Resolution; and were they not words which had no meaning whatever?

MR. AYRTON said, he did not wish to discuss the merits of the Motion further than to say that, as he had always opposed the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum, he could have no difficulty in voting for it, except that it might possibly have the effect of postponing a decision of the question to a distant day. The Committee had been discussing and deciding a very important question in the absence of the whole of Her Majesty's Ministers. From the gravity of the Question put from the Chair, he should have expected that, before the division, some Member of the Government would have risen to address the Committee and to explain the views of the Ministers. It was always pleasant to Members of the House to find there was what was called conventionally a Leader of the House. There was, as they all knew, a Leader of the Opposition, and it was always pleasant to have the Leader of the House present when great questions were being submitted for decision. As Ministers had not been present to take part in the important division, he was afraid they had not returned to hear the admirable views expressed from the Chair and the suggestion made by the Chairman for the consideration of the Committee. It was that it might be desirable not to depart further and further from the recognized and ordinary usage of Committees of this character. When he first addressed the Chair on the point of Order he did not rely upon it; he extended his inquiry to the question of usage and convenience. The Chairman had suggested, for the consideration of the Committee, the expediency of not enlarging the scope of the Committee's deliberations, so as to include new topics which were not necessarily identified with the subject referred to the Committee. He was anxious to know what were the views of Her Maesty's Ministers with reference to that suggestion, and also upon the substantive proposition before the Committee. Before coming to a final decision upon this proposition the Committee might be assisted by the expression of the views of the Government.

Mr. Whalley

MR. KENDALL thought that while Gentlemen opposite were quarrelling amongst themselves, they ought to feel very much obliged to the First Minister for absenting himself. The question before the House was a very simple one, though the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had a way of mystifying things that he (Mr. Kendall) had really to shake himself before he could be certain what the actual state of the case was. The question was, would they pledge themselves not to apply the proceeds of the Irish Church property to the endowment of the Roman Catholic religion? He did not wonder that Gentlemen who were doing so dishonest a thing as to rob a Church should wish to shy that question; but the country would understand what it all meant.

MR. NEWDEGATE understood the words to mean the preservation of the existing interests of the president and students at Maynooth and also the Regium Donum. He hoped the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) would not go about saying that he (Mr. Newdegate) voted for the Maynooth Grant. By stopping short in the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kircaldy (Mr. Aytoun) they reserved a power of applying every shilling obtained by the disendowment of the Irish Church to Roman Catholic purposes. If it was not intended to endow the Roman Catholic Church out of the spoils of the Protestant Church, why did not they say so? He regretted that Ministers had been absent during the discussion, and that any ambiguity should be allowed to exist on the subject.

MR. J. STUART MILL: The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) has stated that we, who sit on this side of the House, have by the vote we have just given, declared that we intend to retain the power of bestowing the whole or part of the property taken from the Irish Church upon the Roman Catholic body. For myself, and I know for a great portion of those who surround me, I utterly deny that statement. I will resist to the utmost of my power any proposal for giving one farthing of the property to the Roman Catholic or to any other religious body in any shape whatever. I had no motive whatever in voting against the Motion of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun), except that it had been declared by you, Sir, not properly to come within the spirit of the Reference to the Committee; and also because it had been declared to be contrary to the Orders of the House—very strangely, I think—for the hon. Gentleman to alter his Resolution from a form in which I could not vote for it, to one in which I could have done so.

MR. DISRAELI: As I re-entered the House I heard some comments being made upon the duties of the Leader of the House. The duties and the privileges of the Leader of the House are very considerable; but I think they ought to be exercised with moderation, and, perhaps I may presume to say, with some degree of modesty. If I were to take every opportunity of speaking upon every subject, and were to thrust myself forward against the view of the House, in order to give them my opinions upon every possible topic, perhaps I should by so doing not altogether fulfil the duties of the Leader of the House, and should not retain the regard and respect of those among whom I sit. I have no doubt that when the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) has arrived at the position of Leader of the House, this House will find in him a more rigid regulator of their destinies than they have in the Gentleman who now humbly endeavours to fulfil the duties which it falls upon him to discharge. With regard to the point before the House, I can only say that I entirely oppose the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. I am against the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland. What has recently occurred has amounted to what I have always contemplated would take place, and what will be repeated. There has been a quarrel for the plunder among the hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I do not think that it was my duty to give an opinion upon such a subject. With regard to the particular Motion before the Committee—that of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy—had the important principles which it in some degree involves been placed simply and plainly before the House, I should not have shrunk from discussing them, or from giving my opinion upon them; but those principles are mixed up in this Motion with details of an impracticable character, which, if we had agreed to, would have disturbed arrangements of a very ancient date in this country, and which the public had long recognized as conducing to the convenience of the country. Therefore I was silent. I must say with regard to the observations of the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, that I am still of opinion that the manner in which I attempt to perform my duties as Leader of this House is preferable to that ideal which, on several occasions, he has offered to the admiration of this Assembly.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not about to defend the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, who is perfectly capable of holding his own, neither am I about to discuss at large the conduct of Her Majesty's Government to-night. But if I do not proceed to discuss that conduct at the present moment, it is because I do not think that it is desirable to mix up that subject with the one before us, which is already sufficiently difficult and intricate. I must say, however, that I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman has been successful in the explanation he has given. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Motion of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy would, if carried, have disturbed, in a remarkable manner, the arrangements of a very ancient date, in consequence of the mode in which it was drawn up, and notwithstanding this assertion the Minister did not choose to record his vote against it. With the whole of his Colleagues, he left the House, seeking refuge in that small apartment which is appropriated to him. His absence has reminded me of one of his many witty sayings. At the time when my noble Friend (Earl Russell) was Paymaster General, the accommodation of his office was very limited, and the right hon. Gentleman said, "I object to the system of shutting up great men in small rooms." Upon this occasion we have had a most complete exemplification of the system of shutting up in a small room, not one, but many great men, and under circumstances which it may, perhaps, be proper at some future period to enter into. In answer to the hon. Member for Devizes (Mr. Darby Griffith), I must inform him that I am not responsible for the Resolution which is about to be adopted. I have no difficulty—except the formal one I have already mentioned—in acceding to it; but I am not its author. It appears to me that the time has now arrived when it would be satisfactory to the Committee if the minor subjects connected with this question were stated with the same precision with which the major subjects have been stated; and that, therefore, we should make our meaning clear by applying to the minor subjects the very words which we have used with regard to major ones, so as to regard everything in the nature of a just personal interest.

MR. HORSMAN said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) had not yet expressed any opinion with regard to the Question. It would, therefore, be desirable if, before the Committee came to a division, he would favour them with the views of Her Majesty's Government upon the subject.

Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to.

MR. GREENE then proposed, as a further Amendment, to insert the words—

"And that no part of the Endowments of the Anglican Church be applied to the endowment of the institutions of other religious communions."

This was a subject upon which he had been seriously challenged by his constituents. He had no desire to say a word against Roman Catholics; but he felt strongly that they should speak decidedly in the matter, although he must at the same time say that he thought the disendowment of the Irish Church—if it ever occurred—was a long way off.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, as amended, by adding the words—

"And that no part of the Endowments of the Anglican Church be applied to the endowment of the institutions of other religious communions."
—(Mr. Greene.)

Question proposed, "That those words be added to the said proposed Amendment, as amended."

MR. WHITBREAD wished to know, whether the Amendment proposed by the last speaker was not out of order, as being substantially the same as that of the hon. Member for Buteshire (Mr. Lamont)?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that there was an obvious difference between the two Amendments, seeing that one proposed to prohibit the application of any part of the funds of the Anglican Church to the Roman Catholics, whereas that now proposed proposed to prohibit their application to any institutions of other religious communities.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. BRIGHT: I think it is a great misfortune that a question of this difficulty and perplexity should be brought before the House in this way. I think that the hon. Member opposite and myself hold very much the same opinions upon this subject; but I object to the word "institutions," as contained in his Amendment, as being a very wide one. I do not know what it includes or what it excludes according to the interpretation of the hon. Member; but I think it is sufficiently wide to include schools. I objected to the Motion of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy very much on the ground that it would prevent any sum of money obtained by the disendowment of the Anglican Church in Ireland or any portion of the State funds being applied to any denominational schools in Ireland. I said that, in Ireland, it was utterly impossible to have schools which were not denominational, and therefore I was unwilling to vote for a proposition so wide, and, as I thought, so injudicious. The same thing is proposed to be done by the present Amendment, and therefore I cannot vote for it. If any hon. Member is desirous of proposing any Resolution or Amendment upon this subject, he should take care that his Motion should be couched in terms which are not liable to be misunderstood, and will include just what he intends to be included and will exclude just what he intends shall be excluded. When Amendments are brought forward in this hasty way it is absolutely impossible for the Committee to discuss them with satisfaction. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite had exercised his influence on his side of the House as the right hon. Member for South Lancashire has done on this side, we should have settled this difficult matter long ago, and the Resolutions would before this have been reported to the House. I hope the hon. Gentleman, seeing the difficulty which I have raised, and which I think he will not easily meet, without further consideration, will withdraw his Amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am persuaded that hon. Members are desirous of giving to every Member a fair opportunity for considering any proposition which he has to make, and I would point to him that he cannot, and I feel almost persuaded that he will not expect us to bind ourselves to the terms of that which he regards as a vital and fundamental proposition on one of the greatest national settlements or unsettlements—call it which you like—ever proposed, without our having first seen the words of the Amendment — without our knowing exactly what they are, and of our being compelled to ask you, Sir, to read the words over and over again as we proceed to discuss them. I therefore ask that these words might be distinctly put before us in print before we are called upon to discuss them—that they should be printed in the Votes, in order that we may have an opportunity of fully considering them. That course, I feel convinced, will commend itself to every Member of this Committee.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE : There is one expression which has just fallen from my right hon. Friend which exactly touches the point. He first spoke of this as a great national settlement, and then immediately corrected himself by saying it was a great national unsettlement.

MR. GLADSTONE : I said no such thing. I did not want to be interrupted by my right hon. Friend and others of his mind, and to avoid it I said "unsettlement," knowing the view he takes of the question.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE : Precisely so. The question before the Committee is the settlement or the unsettlement of the Irish Church. If it is to be a settlement of the question we ought to know what is to be done with the funds of the Church; and, if the object is to be unsettlement, it is an unstatesmanlike proceeding which we were told before was a desire to be in a position the better to settle it. It is hardly to be wondered at now that we have arrived at this point, that hon. Members who now begin to see the practical bearing of these Resolutions should begin to ask some questions, so as to endeavour to arrive at a clear conclusion as to what it is that is really to be done. It may be necessary to take a little further time to consider this Resolution. As the Amendments grow out of that which has already been passed. I do not see that any reproach attaches to those hon. Members who have been called on to consider Resolutions for the disestablishment of the Irish Church, for putting forward Amendments on which to test the sense of the Committee.

MR. GLADSTONE : Considering that the right hon. Baronet rose to reply to me I take the liberty of saying that he has not attacked one word that I said. I cast no reproach on the hon. Gentleman for proposing this Amendment; but I merely asked for time to consider it. And the demand for time is so equitable that even the right hon. Baronet cannot decline to recommend it. I ought to recollect that the right hon. Gentleman's mind must be filled with the questions which he gave us distinct intimation he had within him, and which he intended to propose in Committee. He said he would oppose the first Resolution; if that was carried he would oppose the second Resolution; and after the second he would oppose the third Resolution; but the political exigencies came upon him which made the redemption of those pledges inconvenient, and we need not be surprised if a little of his pent-up matter has irregularly spent itself.

SIR JAMES FERGUSON : The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) complains that there is a disposition on the Ministerial side of the House to support Amendments not previously placed on the Paper; but is he not going to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) which has not been put on the Paper, and which was only placed in the Chairman's hands, in writing, a few minutes since? Allow me to point out also that, by the course adopted, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) has been precluded from altering his Resolution in a manner that would have commanded the support of the hon. Members for Brighton and Westminster (Mr. Fawcett and Mr. Stuart Mill). It does not, therefore, lie in the right hon. Gentleman's mouth to tell the hon. Member that he is improperly seeking to ask the Committee to vote upon an important Amendment that has not been placed on the Paper. It is of the greatest importance that the Committee should be pledged on this point if we are to deal with the revenues of the Established Church in Ireland; because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Louth (Mr. Chichester Fortescue), who filled the important office of Chief Secretary for Ireland told them, in an elaborate speech which he delivered the year before last, that the revenues of the Irish Church ought to be divided amongst other religious communities.

SIR GEORGE GREY : I thought, from what the right hon. Gentleman the first Minister of the Crown stated early in the evening, that it was the desire of the Government to avoid discussion on the main subject in order that the evening might be devoted to the progress of business which it was essential should be transacted; but the conduct of the Government during the last two hours has entirely negatived that supposition. I have no reason to complain of the general way in which the right hon. Gentleman conducts the business of the House; but with all due deference to him, one of his duties is to support the Chairman. A Resolution was moved to-night and an objection was taken in point of form to its being proceeded with, because it did not fall within the terms of Reference. The Chairman stated very fairly that he had some doubt whether it fell strictly within the terms, but it was certainly contrary to the spirit of the Reference. Now, if the right hon. Gentleman, instead of withdrawing with his Colleagues from the House and leaving it to find its own way through the difficulty that had arisen, had supported the Chair, and advised hon. Members not to enter on discussions which did not come within the spirit of the Reference, much time would have been saved, and we should have been spared the exhibition that has just taken place. Instead of that a Member of the Government stood up and stated that he intended to support the Resolution; and not one syllable was uttered in opposition to the hon. Baronet the Member for Ayrshire (Sir James Fergusson), and when the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) was put every Member of the Government withdrew. I have listened with great attention to the discussion that has taken place, and I am the more and more convinced that if we had taken the advice of the Chairman, and declined to continue the discussion, as not being within the spirit of the Order of Reference, we should have avoided embarrassing the Committee, and the progress of business. We are discussing a question that can have no practical effect in the present Parliament, with a view to legislation. We are called on to deal with a mere abstract Resolution, which cannot in the slightest degree be binding on the future Parliament. With regard to the question of Notice, I must say that that part of the Resolution which embodies the Motion of the right hon. Member for Bedford has been on the Paper for some length of time, though it has been altered to make its intention perfectly clear. I would remind hon. Members who oppose the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum, that by what is now proposed they are giving a new lease to both; for what is proposed is practically saying that until you disendow the Irish Church the Maynooth Grant and the Regium Donum shall continue.

Sir George Grey

MR. DISRAELI: The right hon. Baronet has, unfortunately for us, been for a long time absent from our discussions, and that is really the only way in which I can account for the wild observations he has just made. He has made charges against me which I am sure the Committee, after calmly considering, will say are without foundation. ["Oh, oh!"] Now, I beg to say that those sounds I hear are neither logic nor language. The right hon. Baronet first accuses the Government, so far as I can follow him, with preventing the Committee from coming to a conclusion on the Resolutions proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. Now, I thought that, so far as I could control the business of the House, that I had come to a clear understanding with the right hon. Gentleman, that so far as I could influence the conduct of my Friends, without in the slightest degree compromising their political action, that the course of business should be facilitated; and with reference to that there is not the slightest charge that can be made against me. The right hon. Baronet accuses me with sanctioning Amendments from this side of the House; but that is not so. They have come from Members on the other side of the House, and that fact must surely have occurred to the right hon. Baronet when he was making charges which have no foundation. The right hon. Gentleman says I ought to have been present and supported the Chairman in his decision against the Amendment. Now, I was in my place, yielding to the decision of the Chairman, as I always do to the decisions of the authorities of this House. I must frankly confess—though no doubt I was wrong—I did not agree with the Chairman; still the decision of the Chairman permitted the discussion of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, and it was not for me to question it. I am not responsible for the Amendments that have been made, because they come from the other side of the House, and I am not guilty of not having supported the Chairman. He, no doubt, gave an opinion which he thought right, but with which I do not agree, and I must say that it is no part of the duty of a Leader of the House of Commons to prevent the independent expression of opinion. Both sides of the House will not agree in the reflection of misconduct on my part, and will be of opinion that the observations of the right hon. Baronet are unfounded and uncalled for.

MR. POWELL said, that whatever might be the result of this conversation, it had cast a broad light upon previous discussions respecting the Irish Church, and had shown that the further they advanced the greater were the difficulties in the way. There were various modes of conducting public proceedings, and the plan pursued by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire was to carry his Resolutions and then withdraw the explanations which had accompanied and recommended his Resolutions. The explanations which the right hon. Gentleman had given had illustrated his meaning, and he had shadowed forth with more or less fulness various schemes. They had a denunciation of levelling up and a commendation of levelling down, and they had been told what portions of the Irish Church property should be retained and what would be required for other than existing interests. When, however, the Committee proceeded to carry into effect the spirit of the explanations by which the Resolutions were accompanied, then a different voice came from the other side, and they were told that they were not to proceed any further. If they disestablished the Irish Church they must disendow her, and they must also deal in a corresponding manner with the grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum. He was one of those who had never given a vote on the Maynooth question; but if the Irish Church was to be deprived of its revenues, then the question of Maynooth must be gone into, and, much as he should regret that the Presbyterians should lose their annual grant, the lesser must share the affliction of the larger denomination. Having passed these Resolutions it was plain that our difficulties had not come to an end. In fact, they had not yet been discovered, and as the House went into the details of the disestablishment of the Church they would find their difficulties increase and their embarrassments multiply.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, this was the first real and substantial bonâ fide discussion which they had had on the subject of disestablishment, for it had really brought out the merits of the question for the first time. It may be said that this was an attempt to obtain an indefinite and abstract Resolution by impulsive speeches, and to obtain powers over the funds of the Church without the House or the country knowing what was to be done with them. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had declined to intimate anything with any certainty on the subject. Who knew what was meant to be done? He had spoken of retaining the churches and the glebes for the Protestant Church. But how would that satisfy his followers who advocated total disendowment? Would the Gentlemen below the Gangway follow him in this? What distinction did he make between tithe and glebe? In some cases the glebes formed a large part of the income of the parsons; in others he spoke of tithes where there was scarcely any glebe. [MR. GLADSTONE: I never said anything of glebe.] Then the right hon. Gentleman probably drew a distinction between the glebe and the glebe-house; but how would he separate the house from the glebe? On each side he was led, unintentionally, of course, into an appearance of disingenuousness. The right hon. Gentleman had given a sound of so uncertain a character that his supporters outside the House would to-morrow, when they read the debate, find themselves in a very anomalous position. They would see that the right hon. Gentleman, having taken away the revenues of the Established Church, still retained in his hands the power of distributing them among other denominations. The hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill) had just said that, if the funds of the Church were to be applied to the endowment of the Roman Catholics he would have voted against the Resolutions. The hon. Member was equally in error on the point of Order. He supported that part of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy which the Chairman said was out of order; but he felt a difficulty in supporting that which was in order. In fact the hon. Gentleman appeared to have been entrapped, by the course which this discussion had taken, into supporting a proposition, the tendency and results of which he did not approve.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, that the House was landed in a confusion which was becoming still more confused already. He had always abstained from saying or doing anything which might excite religious animosity, and had always voted for the continuance of the Maynooth Grant, though opposed to the wishes of the constituency which he represented. There were two modes of disturbing the religious peace of a country—the one was by transferring the Church revenues from one denomination to another, the other by levelling downwards. But he contended that there was a third and better course for the House to follow, and that was to have a religion established which would exercise a perfect toleration towards other religions. That was the best arrangement for the preservation of religious peace. But now they were beginning to quarrel over the spoils. His idea was that, if there was money to be had out of the Irish Church the lawyers and Commissioners would get the greater part of it. And, after all, how much did this money amount to? If he was not mistaken, it was only £447,000 a year, of which £380,000 alone was devoted to parochial endowments. But, in order to show how small a sum that was, whether absolutely or relatively, he would remind the Committee that the cost of the printing and stationery for Parliament this year was estimated at £395,000. He hoped, therefore that, in whatever spirit they discussed the question, it would not have reference to money. He had also a great objection to the use of the word "doomed." He could not bear to hear people speak, as if they were Pagans, about things being "doomed."

Mr. HIBBERT appealed to the hon. Member (Mr. Greene) to withdraw his Amendment. ["No, no!"] He begged to direct the hon. Gentleman's attention to this fact, that whatever words he might introduce into the Resolution, or whatever Resolutions might be passed by that House, it was the next Parliament that would have to say what was to be done.

Mr. SCHREIBER said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not comply with the request of the hon. Member, as his Amendment would have exactly the same force as the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman, which might express the opinion of the existing Parliament, but could not pretend to bind that which was to come. He remembered in the Session of 1866, when the right hon. Gentleman, at that time the Leader of the House, had not thought it inconsistent with his position to say of those sitting on the opposite Benches that they had exhibited "a perfect mastery of the arts of ambush." The time had come when he might retort, and congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon his perfect mastery of the "arts of ambush." Now, when some one came behind him stealthily, and in the dark, and tried to stab him in the back, he would catch at the first weapon that came to his hand and try to knock him down with it. The Amendment of his hon. Friend was suddenly presented to him: he caught at it in his need, and would use it against the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Scourfield

Mr. GREENE said, that if there was a Gentleman to whose appeal he would yield it would be the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert), and if he had thought with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire no party ties would have prevented him from supporting the Resolutions. The Motion of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Mr. Aytoun) had been objected to on the ground that it was pointed against one sect; but his (Mr. Greene's) Amendment was wide enough for all. As to this discussion being unexpected—who expected at the opening of the Session to be called upon to vote on the disestablishment of the Irish Church? Indeed, he challenged a single Member to say that he was asked a question on his election about the Irish Church. He much regretted that this had been made a party question, and he said this out of no disrespect to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), to whom he was much indebted for being known at all in the House, for the right hon. Gentleman, on a former occasion, challenged him to speak. He felt bound to press his Amendment.

Mr. HERBERT remarked, that on his election, he was questioned respecting the Irish Church, and gave a decided opinion upon it.

Mr. NEWDEGATE hoped the Amendment would be pressed, since the division upon it would be a test of the feeling of the Committee; but if the question had come upon Members by surprise the debate should be adjourned.

Mr. WHALLEY, regarding the Amendment as a crucial test, moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Whalley.)

Mr. DISRAELI hoped a decision would be at once arrived at, for, considering the state of public business, adjourned debates ought to be discouraged.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That those words be added to the said proposed Amendment, as amended."

The Committee divided :—

Before the Tellers reported the numbers, Mr. Holden, Member for Knaresborough, came to the Table and stated that he had been in the House when the Question was put, but not having heard it he had not voted:—Whereupon the Chairman again stated the Question, and the Honourable Member declared himself with the Ayes:—Ayes 97; Noes 132: Majority 35.

Question,

“That the words ‘when legislative effect shall have been given to the First Resolution of this Committee respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued, due regard being had to all personal interests,’ be added to the word ‘That’ in the Original Question,” —put, and agreed to.

4. Resolved, That when legislative effect shall have been given to the First Resolution of this Committee, respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued, due regard being had to all personal interests.

Resolutions to be reported.

MR. GLADSTONE moved that the Chairman report the Resolutions to the House.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I do not rise to oppose the reporting of these Resolutions; but I think that what has occurred to-night will indicate to the House what will occur in future, and will show the country that those who have introduced these Resolutions to the House have only introduced into this country the elements of confusion.

MR. BRIGHT: Mr. Dodson, I am not aware, Sir, that anything has been said which could have afforded the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of which he has availed himself of firing a parting shot against the Resolutions. But the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman himself, as shadowed forth by his Irish Minister, was that he should pay the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland, and that he should increase or double the Regium Donum. I think the right hon. Gentleman may learn, from what has passed to-night, how small a chance he would have had in this House of passing a measure for the endowment of the Roman Catholic clergy. If he had brought that question fairly before the House, possibly he would not have made very great confusion, for in all probability he would not have been able to induce ten men of his own party to follow him. At any rate, so far as we are concerned, we have taken an opposite course. A large majority of the House—the largest that has ever voted on any great question since 1841—has sanctioned the Resolutions that have been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire. And we find that, notwithstanding a good many Archbishops and Bishops—I am not familiar with all the gradations of dignity in the Established Church, but deans, rectors, vicars, curates, and other clergymen of every order—notwithstanding they have met and made a general protest against the policy that has been pursued by the House, yet I suspect—although there are many honest people throughout the country who would support them—the great preponderating opinion of the people of the United Kingdom will be in favour of the course which the majority of this House has adopted. I will undertake to say that, apart from the prejudices and convictions that arise from association and training in a particular Church, you will find few thoughtful men on public questions in this kingdom who are not in favour of the great measure of justice to Ireland which we are endeavouring to advance. There is no man on either side of this House who will undertake to say that he will find any men, by any species of selection or any microscopic investigation in any country in the world, who have a claim to intelligence and knowledge on public questions, who would not give their sanction and approval to the policy which the House has pursued. Sir, I am as much interested in the peace and prosperity of Ireland and of the United Kingdom as any Gentleman on the opposite side of the House can be, and I have for more than twenty years taken a strong interest in Irish questions. I have deplored the condition of that country. I have felt it to be a scandal to English statesmanship. I have said so here often and often. I have held consistently for twenty years the conviction which the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government himself held then, and which, if it were possible now to put him under an accurate examination from which he could not flinch, he would be obliged to say that he holds now; because, on a recent occasion, he admitted that the main sentiment of that speech which he delivered twenty-five years ago was right. But I am in a different position from the right hon. Gentleman. I have not been endeavouring to climb the ladder of Parliamentary promotion and notoriety. [“Oh!”] No, Sir, I have only had the single object—so far as I have had anything to do with Irish questions—to promote what appeared to be just to that country, and which would tend to the ad-

VICTORIA—THE APPROPRIATION ACT.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LYVEDEN, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Correspondence respecting and arising from the Non-enactment of the Appropriation Act in Victoria consequent upon the Recall of the Governor of the Colony, said, that he could hardly hope, after the excitement of a crisis in this country, to attract their Lordships' minds to one in a distant colony which was however of the utmost importance. But, in the first place, he desired to say that in the remarks which he was about to make, he was far from desiring to make this a party question, and still more was he desirous of avoiding anything like a personal attack on the noble Duke at the head of the Department (the Duke of Buckingham), to whose courtesy he was ready to bear his personal testimony. The position in which the colony of Victoria now stood was this—Previously to the year 1850 the colony was known as the settlement of Port Philip. In 1850, however, it was constituted a colony; the Constitution given to it by an Act of the Imperial Parliament comprised a Legislative Council, part of which was nominative and part elective. But by a subsequent Act it received the usual colonial Constitution, consisting of a Legislative Assembly and a Legislative Council, the former being elected by a large constituency, and the latter being elected for a longer term of years by electors possessing a higher franchise. Between these two Assemblies had arisen the same dispute that had prevailed in the mother country respecting their privileges, and the House of Assembly had tried the system of what were here called "tacks" by way of compelling the Council to carry measures which would not be by themselves accepted. In the midst of these contests occurred the appointment of Sir Charles Darling. Now, of Sir Charles Darling he (Lord Lyveden) desired to speak with the utmost respect. He had filled the office of Governor of different colonies under the Crown for upwards of eighteen years, with the approbation of those Secretaries of State under whom he had served. But circumstances of great difficulty arose in the government of Victoria, in consequence of this conflict between the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly was what might be termed a Protectionist body, passing the Appropriation Bill, and tacked on to it a Protectionist and not very euphonious title, and the Upper House refused to pass it, led to considerable discussion. Sir Charles Darling sided with the Legislative Assembly, and the recall by the Home Government, withstanding his long and arduous services, he was left without pension or retiring allowance, or re-appointment. A Committee of the Legislative Assembly having considered the case, and desiring to reward Sir Charles for his services, recommended a grant of £20,000 to Lady Darling, to the objection they knew existed for himself. This Vote of the Legislative Assembly, however, failed for want of sanction of the Upper House. Lord Lyveden considered that this was of the utmost importance; it involved the question whether the colonies should maintain any control over the colonial Government. It was an invariable rule, either personally, or by family, any sum of money was not to be paid out of the colony under his government. Mr. Molesworth, when Secretary of the Colonies, sent a circular to the governors of the colonies in the following terms:—

"I have had lately some reason to think that a rule, for some time established, respecting Majesty's colonial service, is not generally known. It is that which absolutely prohibits the receipt of pecuniary or valuable presents from the inhabitants of the colonies under their administration or any other persons during the continuance of their office. It is quite unnecessary for me to detail the reasons for this prohibition, which are evident of themselves. It may be enough to say that they are considerations affecting the honour of the Crown, and the high importance, but on the necessity of maintaining them, in the eyes of the public, of the Government. 2 These reasons apply to all presents of the same description received by any person on leaving his office with scarcely an exception during its continuance. And although the Government cannot exercise direct control over the actions of gentlemen at the point of leaving the public service, their duty to record this opinion, and their hope that it may be acted on, is a rule."

By the 39th Colonial Regulation the Governor was prohibited from presenting pecuniary or valuable presents to the inhabitants of the colony, or any Manners) rises in his place and confesses to an innocent forgetfulness of the plans which the Government shadowed forth for concurrent endowment in Ireland. The noble Lord knows nothing of them, he never even heard of them; they were never mentioned, I suppose, in the Cabinet; and that compels me to refresh his memory with the words which have not perhaps been supplied to him by the noble Earl (the Earl of Mayo) who sits next to him. I suppose the noble Lord knew nothing of the intentions of the Government at the time, when that noble Earl rose in his place and on behalf of the noble Lord and in the name of the noble Lord no less than in that of any other Member of the Cabinet, not in declaring his own opinion, not in dealing merely with the affairs of his own Department, but in redeeming a formal pledge given in both Houses of Parliament that he (the Earl of Mayo), should declare the unanimous judgment and opinion of the Cabinet, used these words, of which the noble Lord the First Commissioner of Works has not, forsooth, the slightest idea—

“There would not, I believe, be any objection to make all Churches equal; but this result must be secured by elevation, and not by confiscation.”

And, Sir, upon this occasion I enjoy a rare advantage; for it is not often permitted to a humble Member of the Opposition to enlighten a Cabinet Minister as to the intentions of his own Colleagues, which have been declared in his name and in his hearing. So much, Sir, for that part of the noble Lord's speech. And now I come to his truly candid representation of the vote at which we have just arrived; and I think I shall contrive to put upon it a colour different from that which the noble Lord has attached to it. We have just voted, Sir, that we would not add, to a proposal that was before the House, words which forbade us to give any portion of any money that might be realized from the property of the Church in Ireland to any institution connected with any religious communion whatever. That is to say that, if there were a school in Ireland under the patronage and guidance of a particular religious community, to that school—and I believe even its mere connection with a religious communion, even if it did not teach their tenets, would have been enough to bring it under the prohibition—to that school we should be forbidden to vote a single shilling. But what would have been the case of the Established Church? And now we shall see the dispassionate impartiality of the noble Lord. We have passed a vote with regard to the Established Church which excluded the word “dis-endow,” because we have reserved to ourselves the power to deal liberally on every question of construction and interpretation as far as the Established Church is concerned. And then the noble Lord, having obtained from us our solemn pledge for that liberal mode of dealing in regard to the Established Church, endeavoured to obtain from us a vote by which, for every other body, the strictest and most iron application of this most rigorous rule should be secured, so that he should still be able in some form or other to maintain in Ireland his beloved religious inequality. And that was the system and method of proceeding against which my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, with the courage of an Englishman, recorded his fair and manly vote.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman says that he heard from me language which had never before been used by a Prime Minister. Well, Sir, what was that language? I said—as a summary of the debate, the materials of which must be familiar to almost all now present—that when the Resolutions of the right hon. Gentleman were reported, it was my opinion that, from what had occurred to-night, we might judge what elements of confusion had been introduced into our proceedings. I will only say this, that if that be language which, under the circumstances, has never been used by a Prime Minister, a Prime Minister has never used for the occasion appropriate and sensible language. If anyone had been present at these debates, and had heard the various propositions that were made in consequence of the passing of the right hon. Gentleman's Resolutions, so contrary to one another, so considerable in their operation and in their influence, and indicating the opinion of various sections of this House, representing, I have no doubt faithfully, the opinion of large portions of the population of this country—I say, if anyone had been present, and had heard those propositions, and would not admit that they indicated the confusion of the public mind, in consequence of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals, he would refrain from making an admission which I am sure every frank and candid nature would willingly allow. More than this, I say that what has occurred to night is an indication of still further confusion on the subject; and I cannot doubt that long before we can arrive at anything like a settlement of this question, we shall have among the propositions made in this House—and made from different sides of the House—some that will much affect the present discipline and disposition of parties, because they will more faithfully reflect the conscience and the convictions of the country. Sir, I shall not condescend to notice at length the observations of the hon. Member for Birmingham. He says that when it was my duty to make a communication to the House, of the greatest importance, and which I certainly wished to make—as I hope I did make it—in a manner not unbecoming the occasion—I was at once “pompous and servile.” Well, Sir, if it suits the heat of party acrimony to impute such qualities to me, any Gentleman may do so; but I am in the memory and in the feeling of Gentlemen on both sides of the House—and fortunately there are Gentlemen on both sides of this House—they will judge of the accuracy of this representation of my conduct. It is to their feeling and to their sentiment on both sides of the House that I must appeal; and no words of mine, if the charge be true, can vindicate me. The hon. Gentleman says that he will make no charge against me—and then he makes insinuations which, if he believes, he ought to bring forth boldly as charges. I defy the hon. Member for Birmingham, notwithstanding his stale invective, to come down to this House and substantiate any charge of the kind which he has presumed only to insinuate. Let him prefer those charges; I will meet him; and I will appeal to the verdict only of Gentlemen who sit on the same side of the House as himself.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he should not notice the observations of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright), nor the personalities which had been bandied about between the leading Members of the House. He desired to recall the attention of the Committee to the main issue—to the discovery of that night. From the statement last made by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), it was clear that, in his opinion, the difference between the two parties was this—the right hon. Member for South Lancashire declared that Her Majesty's Government intended to endow the Roman Catholic Church and other denominations in Ireland, but not out of the property of the Irish Church. He (Mr. Newdegate) did not believe they had any such intention. This, however, was now clear: the right hon. Member for South Lancashire himself proposed to take the property of the Protestant Church, and to give it to the Roman Catholics. The right hon. Gentleman said that he had voted against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Mr. Greene), because he might wish to apply part of the property of the Irish Church to denominational schools. There were schools in Ireland belonging to monastic and conventual establishments connected with the Church of Rome. It was probably for the purpose of endowing these Popish schools or establishments that the right hon. Gentleman sought to rob the Church of Ireland.

Mr. Disraeli

House resumed.

COLONEL STUART KNOX rose, and asked Mr. Speaker whether, the last Resolution, as it stood, was within the scope of the Order of Reference which had been given to the Committee, the Resolution referring to other things besides the Established Church? He put the question because the Chairman seemed to have some doubt on the point.

MR. SPEAKER begged to remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that the Resolutions had not yet been reported to him.

THE CHAIRMAN then brought up the Resolutions, and the first three were agreed to without comment.

On Question, “That the fourth and last Resolution be agreed to,”

COLONEL STUART KNOX again appealed to the Speaker to say whether it came within the Order of Reference.

MR. SPEAKER replied, that the Chairman of Committees was the proper judge of those matters which came under his notice while in Committee. He could not interfere with the decision of the Chairman at the suggestion of an individual Member. To authorize him to do so the Question must be brought before him by direction of the House.

COLONEL STUART KNOX begged to move that the Question be raised, and that the Chairman be requested to state his opinion. [“No, no!”]

Resolutions reported;

1. “That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property."

2. "That, subject to the foregoing considerations, it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage, and to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity, or such as involve individual rights, pending the final decision of Parliament."

3. "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present Session, the creation of new personal interests through the exercise of any public patronage, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishopsrics, Bishopsrics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof."

4. "That when legislative effect shall have been given to the First Resolution of this Committee, respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued, due regard being had to all personal interests."

Resolutions agreed to.

Resolved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present Session, the creation of new personal interests through the exercise of any public patronage, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishopsrics, Bishopsrics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

To be presented by Privy Councillors.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 71.]

(The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Disraeli, The Attorney General for Ireland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Earl of Mayo.)

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that he rose on his own part, and on the part of those who sat near him, to say that they had no intention of opposing the second reading of this Bill. At the same time, he wished to say that, in the opinion of most of those who sat on that side of the House, there were many important points in the Bill upon which it would be their duty in Committee to raise some serious discussions and propose some important changes. In fact, they took the Bill on its second reading as the foundation of a Reform Bill for Ireland; but beyond that they were not inclined to go. The Bill was divided into two heads, that of the franchise, and that of the re-distribution of seats. As to the borough franchise, he admitted that there was much to be said in favour of the course that Government had taken in availing themselves of the line drawn by the existing law of rating under the Poor Law system, and fixing the franchise at a £4 rating. He must, however, say that he thought that it would be impossible to maintain the county franchise at the figure at which it at present stood—namely, £12. He admitted that when, in 1866, he himself introduced a Reform Bill for Ireland he did not propose to lower the county franchise; but the state of things had since then materially altered. After the great reduction which had been effected in the county franchise in England, and when it was proposed to reduce it in Scotland, it would be very difficult to persuade the people of Ireland to be satisfied with a Franchise Bill that left the county franchise at its present rate; while the reduction of the borough franchise would add but a very small number to the total of the electors. So long as eighteen years ago, an £8 franchise was proposed for Irish counties by Earl Russell; and therefore it was hardly possible that now a £12 franchise would be agreed to. He did not believe that a lower franchise would produce a very different constituency; but, at all events, it would be a more extended and more popular franchise. As to the proposed re-distribution of seats, there was scarcely anything in that portion of the Bill to which he could give assent; and to the greater part of the proposals, he thought that there were most serious objections. It was quite true that the towns of Ireland were comparatively small in number of population, and were inferior in valuation to the counties; but he held this to be a sound principle for an Irish Reform Bill, that the transfer from the borough representation to the county representation should be confined within the smallest possible limits. The county representation of Ireland, however respectable and important, was of an extremely uniform and monotonous character; for the constituency consisted almost exclusively of landlords and tenants. On the other hand, the boroughs, though somewhat insignificant when compared with the great towns of England and Scotland, were important as centres of representation.

and were the only means by which various interests could find representation in the House. Further, as Irish prosperity developed itself and Ireland ceased to be an exclusively agricultural country, the importance of the towns would every year increase. He objected to the proposed re-distribution, because it was not founded upon any distinct rule or governed by any standard of population, of electors or of property; and not being founded upon any rule, the scheme would require justification in every particular instance. He held that if small Irish boroughs were to be disfranchised, the system should have been the one which had uniformly been adopted in former Bills, that of taking the boroughs smallest in population; but the Government had passed over some of the smallest boroughs, and had extinguished boroughs that had a far stronger claim for representation. He thought that there was a great deal to be said in favour of a system of grouping as applied to Irish boroughs. He further objected to the proposition to transfer the borough Members to counties; and it was, at all events, a new thing to divide a county into two unequal parts, and say that two-thirds of the county should return two Members, and that the other third part should be formed into a separate electoral district to return one Member to Parliament. Whilst they had not thought it right in the case of counties to give a third Member to the whole constituency, yet they did in this way give the third Member to the city of Dublin. These were the principal points which, so far as he knew, it would be their duty to raise in Committee.

COLONEL FRENCH, who had given Notice of his intention to move that the Bill be read a second time on that day six months, said, that he thought that it was hardly in accordance with the rules of Parliamentary courtesy for the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. Fortescue) to state his own opinions at that time, when he (Colonel French) had a distinct Notice in opposition to the Bill upon the Paper. The Government stated that one of the principal reasons for continuing in Office was their desire to carry out Reform Bills for Ireland and Scotland. So far as he and those who acted with him were concerned, the Government need not burden themselves with such an Office, for there was not a single portion of the Irish Bill with which they were content. The Bill was objectionable from the beginning to the end, and, judging from the numerous Notices given by his hon. Friends for in regard to the Scotch Bill equally dissatisfied with the same. As regarded this matter of perfect indifference dissolution of Parliament took or after the passing of the Bill of the Irish Members believe Parliament would give Ireland. It was remarkable that in this there was no reference to the clause. It was not even alluded to in the Bill. Was it to be borne that county franchise was to be 170,000, and that not a single vote be added to the Irish county and that only 9,000 votes be added to the Irish borough when the English boroughs were to be increased to the extent of 100,000? He believed that, if the Bill were altogether the House would be a really good measure with an addition as would enable them to do so, but he would not make the Motion he had given Notice, but would ascertain the views of those who were with him upon the Opposition Bench.

MR. REARDEN, who had given Notice upon the Paper declaring that he would move that an Irish Reform Bill be introduced to provide for resident manhood as a vote by ballot; that no borough be disfranchised; and that the representation of Ireland should be placed on a footing with that of England and Wales, one Member for every 40,000 of population—said, he would not offer any Amendment to the second reading of the Bill, but would reserve himself the right of moving an Amendment in Committee. At the same time he thought Ireland was not receiving justice with England in her representation, and he should be able to prove in Committee that, from her population, her imports and exports, and her revenue Ireland entitled to 169 Members if she were on a footing of equality with England and Wales in regard to her representation.

MR. PEEL DAWSON expressed disappointment that, in the present Bill relating to re-distribution of justice had not been done to the province of Ulster, which was a score of numbers, assessment of property, or of the visible signs of progress in industry. The Census of 1861 showed that out of the total population of the country amounting to 5,790,000, the pop-

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

Ulster was 1,915,000, or exactly one-third of the whole. But, of the 105 Members returned from Ireland, only 29, or little more than a fourth, came from the Northern province. If its due proportion, therefore, were allotted, Ulster should have 35 Members. Contrasted with the other provinces of Ireland, the injustice was still more striking. Ulster had a population greater by 500,000 than that of Munster, yet Ulster had only two Members additional. The population of Leinster was 1,452,000, as against 1,915,000 in Ulster; yet Leinster had 34 representatives, while Ulster had only 29. Contrasted with Scotland, the anomaly was even more striking. Under the proposed arrangements, Scotland would, in future, return at least 60 Members; Ulster, with a population equal to two-thirds of that of Scotland, would upon that scale be entitled to 40 representatives. The people, moreover, had a common origin, and were very similar in character and pursuits. Judging by the Irish standard, Ulster would thus be entitled to 35 Members; and if the Scotch precedent were acted upon, she ought to have 40. He regretted that the system of grouping had not been introduced into the Irish Bill. That system had been found to work advantageously in Scotland and Wales, and he did not see why it should not be tried in Ireland. Under such a system several excellent districts might have been created in the North of Ireland. In Armagh, Lurgan and Portadown would have formed a good constituency, with a population of 16,000; and Newtownards and Ballymena might be similarly associated. The county of Antrim should be divided into two parts for representation, and he thought the city of Londonderry possessed superior claims to Galway in the same respect. He was of opinion that the representation of the North should be strengthened, even although it should be done at the expense of the South. He was willing to accept the proposition of the Government with regard to the franchise. He congratulated them on not lowering the county franchise below the figure at which it was proposed to fix it. He did not quite approve the reduction of the franchise in the boroughs, as he feared it might have an injurious effect in certain towns in which disaffection was said to exist; but he did not think the Government had any choice in the matter, because it would not be possible to keep up a higher rate of franchise in a poorer county than that which had been decided on for England. They must only trust to the healing influences of remedial legislation, and to that spirit of loyalty which actuated all persons of property and influence in Ireland.

MR. PIM thought that the scheme for the re-distribution of seats was very defective; and, unless it were improved in Committee, he was of opinion that it would be better to confine the Bill to the franchise. He should have no objection to see additional Members given to Ulster, if that could be done without taking them from the other provinces. It appeared to him that the Government ought to have had recourse to the system of grouping which had worked so well in Scotland and in Wales, and which was peculiarly adapted to the circumstances of Ireland. No fewer than eighty-four Irish boroughs had been disfranchised at the Union. In many cases, probably, the disfranchisement took place with the object of bribing the owners by payment for their interest in those boroughs. He thought they ought to make use of the present opportunity to remedy the error then committed, and replace the most important of those towns in the rank of boroughs; and, by uniting them to some of the existing boroughs, form groups, which would be as valuable a portion of the Irish constituencies as they are of the Scotch and Welsh. He objected to the proposed disfranchisement of the six small boroughs, because it would weaken the borough constituencies, and thus afford a plausible argument for giving increased representation to the counties at the expense of the boroughs; and he thought it would be wrong to decrease the borough representation. The large and important county of Cork had certainly a strong claim to be divided into two ridings, and to return four Members instead of two; but no valid reason had been shown for taking these additional members from the boroughs. The electors in boroughs were generally much more independent in their action than the electors in counties; and it would therefore, be decidedly a loss to the independence of the constituencies if the borough representation was diminished. Another objection to the Government proposal as to the six small boroughs was that, supposing their plan of franchise to be affirmed, a large number of the present electors in these boroughs would be deprived of the franchise, as they would lose the right of voting in the boroughs; and their qualification is not sufficient to entitle

Members to 39 Members sitting for cities and boroughs. Surely, looking at these numbers in Great Britain, no one could think of proposing any further reduction in the city or borough representation of Ireland. He had ventured to propose a system of grouping. He would not say that it was the best that could be devised, as a private Member had not the information which the Government could command; and it was from the Government that such a proposal ought properly to come. He had proposed to group fifty-three towns in fourteen groups, each group having an average population of about 20,000, and the aggregate amounting to 289,853 persons. According to the franchise scheme of the Government these groups would probably have about 16,700 electors, and it would raise the whole civic and borough constituency of Ireland to about 1,048,000 inhabitants and 57,000 electors. He could not help expressing his surprise that the Government did not contemplate bestowing a third Member upon the thriving and important borough of Belfast—an addition which ought also, in his opinion, to be made to the representation of Cork. He desired, moreover, to call attention to the fact that it was not proposed to give a Member to Kingstown, which, if represented, would rank fifth in regard to population, and fourth in regard to wealth, of the boroughs in Ireland.

Mr. VANCE, in spite of the criticism which had been bestowed upon the measure, regarded it as one which, on the whole, dealt with the question in a satis-

the town population than the cities; and the people of the country had the honour of being independent, being borough, as a new aid; but in case in other Ireland long ago contained a Member (Mr. P.) his supporters would have shown the expenses of the Government not less than 7,000 pounds. That known in the North characterized the independence which the forefathers. He hope that the increased representation of Ireland.

Mr. SHERIDAN opposed the scheme for Dublin, as the Government had ventured. It depended upon independent electors, and it grew without making should not lose sight of itself, he said, because he thought enfranchisement of the poor was only a calculation of those who were not interested. An effort the independent representation of the towns of Lurgan and Portadown, in the county of Armagh, on the ground of their increased population and importance. He felt bound to insist that the representation of Ireland should be treated in the same liberal manner as that of Scotland.

COLONEL GREVILLE-NUGENT trusting that the Bill would pass in an altered form, thought it unwise to oppose the second reading. Its provisions violated the principles of the English Bill. One was that no borough should be disfranchised; and this Bill disfranchised six. There were more borough Members than county Members for England; Ireland had sixty-four county to thirty-nine borough Members; and yet it was proposed to reduce the borough and increase the county representation. To transfer counties to boroughs without reducing the county franchise was to restrict rather than extend the franchise. The difficulty was to lower the franchise in the poorer county to the same comparative point as in the richer; but he believed it would be necessary to make a considerable alteration in its provisions regarding this point.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE confessed he had no timorous feelings regarding the reduction of the franchise, and expected that, in that lower stratum, they would find an amount of support on which hon. Members opposite little calculated. It was against the elaborate scheme of grouping embodied in the Bill that he now rose to protest—a system that worked badly both in Wales and Scotland, and which he should be sorry to see forced upon Ireland. Those who represented small constituencies in Ireland like to have them to themselves, and therefore he trusted it would be energetically resisted by Irish Members. It stood to reason that a town would be better able to give expression to its own interests when it stood by itself than when it was grouped with one forty or fifty miles apart.

MR. BRADY said, he must protest against the principle of this Bill, if, indeed, it contained any principle whatever. Household suffrage was granted in England but denied to Ireland. He objected to the £4 "hard line" borough franchise. He altogether objected to the £12 county franchise, and thought it ought to be reduced to £7, because the great mass of the people lived in small tenements. He compared the different franchises existing in England with those proposed to be given to Ireland, and contended that, in this respect, Ireland was most unfairly dealt with. Were it not for his belief that the Bill would be materially altered in Committee, he should second the Motion of his hon. Friend (Colonel French) that it should be read a second time that day six months.

MR. ESMONDE said, that in Committee he should call attention to the freeman franchise.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, as he stated when the noble Earl introduced the Bill, that he could not see that any principle which had been hitherto proposed or accepted by the House had governed him in the preparation of it, he might, perhaps, be permitted, in justification of that opinion, which was expressed at the moment, to say that, having since had the opportunity of more carefully considering the clauses which referred to the re-distribution of seats, that he was confirmed in his opinion, and that he felt that that opinion could be fully sustained. They had had during the last Session, in many and protracted debates which some of them, at least, on this side of the House heard with weariness, a policy announced and insisted upon with reference to a reform of the English constituency which had been disregarded in the Bill proposed for Ireland. The House will permit him to call their attention to the comparative position of the English boroughs, as fixed by the English Bill, and the disfranchisement of the Irish boroughs and the distribution of the Members proposed to be liberated. In England there were no less than twenty-two boroughs sending Members to Parliament of a population less than 6,000. There were ten boroughs of a population less than 5,000. There were twenty-two boroughs of a population less than Bandon, eighteen less than Cashel, nine less than Kinsale, five less than Downpatrick, and four less than Dungan-non. Upon what principle, then, by what mode of calculation had the noble Earl arrived at the determination to disfranchise those five Irish boroughs, and what did he do with the five Members? He gave one to the minority in Dublin. It was pretty clear what class of men that minority would return. Certainly not one who would add to the Liberal ranks in that House. He selected four baronies in Tipperary to form a new constituency—being perfectly well aware that those four baronies were Conservative, and would send a Member to aid the Conservative party to Parliament. [The Earl of Mayo said, he had heard that a result entirely different would be the case.] He thought he was as well informed on that point as the noble Earl; but of this he was quite satisfied, that the four favoured baronies to which he had referred would never have the opportunity afforded them which the noble Earl proposed to give them, as they would not permit his arrangement to be carried into effect. The other Members were given with the same intention to divisions of counties which were safe seats for the noble Earl's party, and doubtless if his Bill were carried in the shape in which it stood, it would be a very favourable party measure. Although he (Mr. O'Beirne) had no intention of offering any opposition to the second reading of the Bill, as he desired to affirm the principle that a Reform Bill was very necessary for Ireland, he assented to it only in principle; and he believed that little of it beyond the Preamble would be accepted by the House, as they were strong enough on that side to frame such a measure as would be a fair and useful one for the counties. He quite understood a party measure being produced. He could understand every effort of ingenuity would be exercised to win some strength by such a move; but he confessed he was not prepared for the introduction of a Bill such as that before them, which so openly and undisguisedly exposed the objects of its framer. An astute Minister might have wrapped up to some extent his designs; but the noble Earl had not done so. They knew what was intended, and he had no doubt whatever that they would yet succeed in framing a good and useful measure, differing in all essential points from that now on the table. As he had said, he had risen to set himself right with the House. He had proved, he thought, that, so far as disfranchisement and re-distribution, there was neither reason, principle, nor justice in the proposal, and he had, therefore, only to add, that he had no desire to offer any opposition to the second reading of the Bill, which must be made a good one in Committee.

MR. G. MORRIS protested against the grouping scheme referred to by the hon. Member for Dublin (Mr. Pim). He suggested that, in accordance with the English Act, a schedule should be attached authorizing the payment of carriage hire to bring up the voters of boroughs to the poll, where, like Galway, the borough runs for a considerable distance into the county.

MR. STACPOOLE objected to the
Mr. O'Beirne

grouping scheme of the hon. Member for Dublin.

SIR JOHN GRAY remarked that the Bill did not give the same advantage to Ireland as was given by the English Bill to England. He supported the second reading; but held himself perfectly free to make any alterations in the Bill in Committee. He thought the ballot absolutely essential to the protection of the voters.

THE EARL OF MAYO said, he would not detain the House at any length, as the principles involved in the Bill were rather in the nature of details, which would be best discussed and disposed of in Committee. He was rather surprised to hear the objections which had been urged to the Bill on the ground of supposed differences from the English Act. It was based on principles which were identical with those of the English Act. The county franchise was put at precisely the same figure, and the borough franchise was also the same, being given to every tenant who paid poor-rates. It was quite true that circumstances had arisen in Ireland that, at an early period, would render an alteration in the principle of valuation necessary; but that was a question of valuation, not of the franchise. There was no substantial reason why the county franchise should be lower in Ireland than in England. With regard to the borough franchise, the point at which an occupier became liable to pay rates was £4; below that amount the occupier was exempt from the payment of rates; therefore, adopting residence and personal payment of rates as the qualification, they could not take any other amount. So much for the franchise; and he could not but hope that this, by far the most important portion of the Bill, would be adopted by the House, being essentially the same as that adopted by the House, after much consideration, for England. With regard to the re-distribution, perhaps the most interesting portion, the statements made to-night did not lead him to believe that it was probable any single scheme of re-distribution that could be proposed would be more acceptable, because no sooner did any Member propose a different scheme than it was immediately disapproved by others who followed. It was impossible to establish a system of grouping that would improve and elevate the borough representation. In the great portion of Ireland—certainly in three provinces—there were no materials for a satisfactory increase of the representation at all. The Government proposed in the place of six of the very small insignificant boroughs to create some very large, influential, and independent constituencies. Surely, in a country where agriculture formed the principal staple of industry, it was reasonable to take the representatives from these small boroughs, which, if they represented anything at all, represented agriculture, and give them to large and flourishing agricultural county constituencies. When the Government were taunted with departing in this from the principle of the English Bill, it must be remembered that the circumstances of the two cases were different. In England you had great manufacturing centres which, until last year, were unrepresented; but no places of that kind existed in Ireland. If you represented anything at all you must represent agriculture, and that could not be done more effectually than in the way proposed by the Government. It was objected that they had not drawn a line, taking all the smallest boroughs first. They had dealt with five of the smallest, and the only boroughs excepted, taking them numerically, were Mallow and Enniskillen. The reason for taking the five boroughs mentioned in the Bill was because they were situated in localities to which the representation could justly and properly be transferred, and because the Government thought it better not to attempt to move the representation from the localities, but to transfer it from the small boroughs to the agricultural constituencies around them. That principle had only been departed from in the case of Portarlinton, and that was a point to be discussed in Committee, as was also the proposal to adopt the minority principle, in giving a third Member to Dublin. For his own part, he should not regret if the Committee thought fit to divide the city of Dublin and give it three Members without adopting the minority principle. But he did attach importance to giving these single Members to divisions of the counties. He thought the opinions of the electors in those districts would be much more adequately represented, and a much more satisfactory principle of representation would thereby be created, than by turning these counties into three-cornered constituencies. The House would remember that the Government last year were no great advocates of the minority principle, and he should be sorry to see it extended to Ireland to any great extent. If a larger scheme of distribution were thought necessary by the Committee, he admitted that a case had been made out for giving additional representation to Ulster. As it was, unwarrantable attacks had been made upon the measure, which was said to be framed for party objects. Now, of the six boroughs which were proposed to be dealt with, three returned Liberal and three Conservative Members; there was no partiality in that respect, and he had never made any inquiries whatever as to the political effect of the measure. If the scheme of the Government were adopted, he believed that the representation, in a party sense, would remain very much as it now was, and he repudiated the extraordinary statements of the Liberal Members as to the want of independence on the part of the southern constituencies. If a powerful influence were exerted in one direction, an equally powerful influence was brought to bear on the other. He was sorry that such a state of things should exist in Ireland; but it did exist, and an alteration in the franchise was not likely to affect it materially. He hoped the Bill would be fairly considered in Committee. There was no party object to be gained by it. He believed that the principles on which it was based were sound, and the Government were only anxious to pass a measure which would render more influential and powerful in this House the representation of the people of Ireland.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

House adjourned at half after
One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, May 8, 1868.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Earl of Ellesmere, after the Death of his Father.

PUBLIC BILLS—Second Reading—Broughty Ferry Provisional Order Confirmation * (86).

Committee—Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation * (64); Capital Punishment within Prisons * (83).

Report—Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders Confirmation * (64); Capital Punishment within Prisons * (83).

Third Reading—Local Government Supplemental (1868) * (70), and passed.

VICTORIA—THE APPROPRIATION ACT.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LYVEDEN, in rising to call the attention of the House to the Correspondence respecting and arising from the Non-enactment of the Appropriation Act in Victoria consequent upon the Recall of the Governor of the Colony, said, that he could hardly hope, after the excitement of a crisis in this country, to attract their Lordships' minds to one in a distant colony which was however of the utmost importance. But, in the first place, he desired to say that in the remarks which he was about to make, he was far from desiring to make this a party question, and still more was he desirous of avoiding anything like a personal attack on the noble Duke at the head of the Department (the Duke of Buckingham), to whose courtesy he was ready to bear his personal testimony. The position in which the colony of Victoria now stood was this—Previously to the year 1850 the colony was known as the settlement of Port Philip. In 1850, however, it was constituted a colony; the Constitution given to it by an Act of the Imperial Parliament comprised a Legislative Council, part of which was nominative and part elective. But by a subsequent Act it received the usual colonial Constitution, consisting of a Legislative Assembly and a Legislative Council, the former being elected by a large constituency, and the latter being elected for a longer term of years by electors possessing a higher franchise. Between these two Assemblies had arisen the same dispute that had prevailed in the mother country respecting their privileges, and the House of Assembly had tried the system of what were here called "tacks" by way of compelling the Council to carry measures which would not be by themselves accepted. In the midst of these contests occurred the appointment of Sir Charles Darling. Now, of Sir Charles Darling he (Lord Lyveden) desired to speak with the utmost respect. He had filled the office of Governor of different colonies under the Crown for upwards of eighteen years, with the approbation of those Secretaries of State under whom he had served. But circumstances of great difficulty arose in the government of Victoria, in consequence of this conflict between the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly was what might be termed a Protectionist body, and they, in passing the Appropriation Bill of 1864, tacked on to it a Protectionist tariff, under the not very euphonious title of a Tariff and Appropriation Bill, which, however, the Upper House refused to sanction. This led to considerable discussion, in which Sir Charles Darling sided with the Legislative Assembly, and the result was his recall by the Home Government, and notwithstanding his long and valuable services, he was left without any compensation or retiring allowance, or the chance of re-appointment. A Committee of the Legislative Assembly having investigated the case, and desiring to compensate Sir Charles for his services, recommended a grant of £20,000 to Lady Darling, to avoid the objection they knew existed to a Vote for himself. This Vote of the Legislative Assembly, however, failed to receive the sanction of the Upper House. He (Lord Lyveden) considered that the matter was of the utmost importance; for it really involved the question whether this country should maintain any control over the colonies. It was an invariable rule that no colonial Governor was permitted to receive, either personally, or through his family, any sum of money from the colony under his government. Sir William Molesworth, when Secretary of State for the Colonies, sent a circular to the Governors of the colonies in the following terms:—

"I have had lately some reason to suppose that a rule, for some time established in Her Majesty's colonial service, is not universally known. It is that which absolutely prohibits the receipt of pecuniary or valuable presents by Governors from the inhabitants of the colonies under their administration, or any class of them, during the continuance of their office. It is quite unnecessary for me to detail the reasons for this prohibition, which are evident of themselves; it may be enough to say that they rest on no considerations affecting the honour of gentlemen selected by the Crown to fill situations of this high importance, but on the necessity of preserving them, in the eyes of the public, free from all suspicion. 2. These reasons apply to the receipt of presents of the same description by a Governor on leaving his office with scarcely less force than during its continuance. And although Her Majesty's Government cannot exercise any direct control over the actions of gentlemen on the point of leaving the public service, they feel it their duty to record this opinion, and to express their hope that it may be acted on as a general rule."

By the 39th Colonial Regulation, the Governor was prohibited from receiving presents pecuniary or valuable from the inhabitants of the colony, or any class of them, during the continuance of his office, and from giving such presents, and this rule is to be equally observed on leaving his office. On the Vote of the Assembly coming to the knowledge of Sir Charles Darling, he sent the following message to the Legislative Assembly on the subject:—

"The Governor feels it to be his duty, while yet administering the government, to intimate that his family would not feel at liberty to accept the bounty of the Parliament and people of Victoria, until the Government shall have first ascertained whether Her Majesty may be pleased to signify any commands therein."

Upon this message the Assembly changed their Vote into an Address to Her Majesty praying her to allow the proposal. This was forwarded to the Secretary of State for the Colonies. The answer of the Earl of Carnarvon was as follows:—

"I am unable to advise Her Majesty to accede to the request it conveys. The rule that a Governor should not receive pecuniary or valuable presents from the inhabitants of the colony over which he presides, either during the continuance of his office or on leaving it, is expressly laid down in the Colonial Regulations, and for obvious reasons it has always been rigidly enforced. It is plain that such a rule would be merely nugatory if it were held that what the Governor was precluded from receiving might be properly given to his wife. It is, under these circumstances, impossible that Her Majesty should be advised to sanction the literal or substantial violation of this rule by any of her servants; or, on the other hand, that the acceptance of the proposed gift should be regarded otherwise than as a final relinquishment by Sir Charles Darling of that service, and of all the emoluments and expectations attaching to it.

... If you desire to retain your connection with the colonial service of this country, you are not free to accept the Vote."

His Lordship further added—

"He must regard a gift to a Governor's family as equivalent to a gift to the Governor himself.

... And emoluments by way of pensions to Governors can only be claimed upon the understanding that those who claim them abstain from the acceptance of emoluments which are prohibited by the rules of the service."

If the Governor of a colony were allowed to receive through his family—as in the present instance of the grant of a sum of £20,000 to Lady Darling—the Crown would, in fact, lose all control over the colonies; and it would be better to let them elect their own Governors and pay them. The noble Duke (the Duke of Buckingham) succeeded the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) as Secretary of State; and the new Governor (Sir Henry Manners Sutton), in his first despatch, stated that—

"By the 57th clause of the Constitution Act, the Legislative Assembly was precluded from originating or passing any Vote of money for any purpose not recommended in a Message by the Governor; and a refusal therefore to comply with the advice that the proposed grant to Lady Darling should be included in the Estimates, which are uniformly transmitted by message, would have been in effect a refusal on his part to afford them a constitutional opportunity for discussing it, while his acquiescence in the recommendation of his advisers could not be regarded as implying any personal opinion with respect to the policy of that or any other item included in the Estimates."

That was a most extraordinary statement. He (Lord Lyveden) submitted that Sir Henry Manners Sutton was altogether mistaken in the view he took of the matter. The object of the 57th clause of the Constitution Act was to prevent the Governor from doing exactly what Sir Henry Manners Sutton had done—proposing any Vote of money against the opinion of the Legislative Council and the Secretary of State. The Legislative Assembly never could have voted the money unless the Governor had enabled them to do so by sending down his Message. Sir Henry Manners much support or advice from the noble Sutton in all this did not receive very Duke; certainly his first despatch was a very laconic one. The noble Duke said—

"I have the honour to transmit to you, for your information, the accompanying copy of a letter from Sir Charles Darling, from which you will perceive that he has elected to relinquish the colonial service."

The noble Duke merely informed him of the bare fact, and gave him no instructions on the subject; the letter naturally enough led to the inference that the grant might be accepted: and after such a despatch they could hardly wonder at what Sir Henry Manners Sutton had done. Had the noble Duke expressed any opinion on the Vote to Sir Charles Darling the Governor would have acted on it. The grant had been refused in every shape by the Legislative Council, and the difficulty was proposed to be remedied by the dissolution of the Assembly. The noble Duke forbore to express any opinion on this subject too, and even approved Sir Henry Manners Sutton's conduct in submitting the Vote to the Assembly; indeed, he afterwards says—

"It is not so clear and unmistakable a violation of the existing rule as to call for the extreme measure of forbidding the Governor to be party, under the advice of his responsible ministers, to those formal Acts which are necessary to bring the grant under the consideration of the local Parliament."

But upon every theory of colonial government it was absolutely incumbent on the noble Duke to direct the Governor to abstain altogether from taking the part he had done in this matter. The initiative was given to the Crown for no other reason than to check such grants, which were completely forbidden by the Secretary of State and the Colonial Office Regulations. How stood the question now? The Assembly had been dissolved, and it appeared by the latest accounts the new Assembly were very much of the same temper as the last. He had also seen it stated that the Ministry had resigned. He wished to know what course the noble Duke now intended to pursue. He did not desire to express any opinion in favour of one Assembly or the other; but, with respect to Sir Charles Darling, he could not help thinking that that gentleman was entitled to some consideration from the Crown. A more important consideration, however, related to the action which the Secretary for the Colonies proposed to take at the present moment. It was desirable that the noble Duke should explain why, on one occasion, he told the Governor that he must not propose the Vote except on the clear understanding that it might be brought before the Legislative Council in a manner to enable them to exercise their discretion without throwing the colony into confusion, and on another occasion stated that the proposal of the Vote would not be so clear a violation of the rule of the Colonial Office as to cause him to interfere to forbid its proposal. He wished to know how the noble Duke reconciled those two statements. This was an important question in reference to colonial government; and he could not help thinking that any discussion which might arise on this subject in their Lordships' House would be extremely advantageous, as tending to show what was the opinion of their Lordships as to the position of the colony. In his mind it was one of extreme peril, and so it appeared to the Governor, who stated that a conflict such as that which is now in progress strains the Constitution of the colony, and I cannot assert that the Constitution can endure this strain much longer. In these circumstances he hoped he was justified in calling the attention of their Lordships to the subject and asking some explanation of the views of Her Majesty's Government.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, he agreed with the noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) in thinking the question now raised by no means unimportant, especially as it originated from difficulties which had arisen in one of our most important colonies. It was a question, indeed, which affected the whole of our colonial Empire, and could not be over-rated. It had a two-fold aspect—one in reference to the course to be pursued in dealing with colonies where free institutions were established, and the other in reference to the honour and integrity of the colonial service. In respect of the latter view—a proposal had been made to grant a large sum of money to an officer whom a former Secretary of State thought fit to remove from the government of the colony with which he was charged—an officer who had served long, whose services had been commended by previous Colonial Secretaries, and who relinquished the colonial service of the Crown with the prospect of receiving a grant from the colony he had governed. That was a circumstance which he thought had never before occurred—certainly not of late years. As to the proposal to confer this grant on Sir Charles Darling, he (the Duke of Buckingham) thought there could not be two opinions as to the impropriety of the principle of such a grant. Entertaining that opinion, he had conducted a correspondence of some extent with the Government of Victoria. He did not think that it was necessary that he should go into the question of the recall of Governor Sir Charles Darling, nor as to the position which he now held. The matter clearly resolved into a question as to the conduct which he (the Duke of Buckingham) had pursued since he had been in Office, and whether he ought not to have taken means to prevent the grant being discussed in the Legislative Assembly. The noble Lord had called attention to the origin of the proposal, to the recall of Sir Charles Darling, and to the proposal of the Legislative Assembly to present a grant of £20,000 to Lady Darling, and had referred to the despatches on the subject. Before, however, referring to those despatches, he would dwell for a moment on the position in which the question stood before it came under his cognizance. The noble Lord seemed to think that, when the matter was first brought before him by the letters of Sir Charles Darling, which he transmitted in a brief accompanying despatch to the colonies, he ought to have sent out instructions that the Vote was on no account to be submitted to the consideration of the Legislative Assembly. Now, he certainly should not have been indisposed, had he felt he had the power to act in consonance with his own feelings on the subject, to take that course; but he had to take into account not merely the power which the Government had, but the position in which the whole affair at the time stood. That position was that, in May, 1866, certain Resolutions had been passed by a Committee of the Legislative Assembly proposing to make the present in question to Lady Darling. The Answer of Sir Charles Darling to the Address communicating the Resolutions were answered by Sir Charles in proper terms. Subsequently to the Answer of Sir Charles Darling to the Address, and partly in consequence of it, an Address was transmitted to this country on the 26th of May, from Victoria, requesting that Her Majesty might be graciously pleased to give her sanction to the grant. That despatch reached England on the 20th of July; and an answer to it was sent out to the colony, but no peremptory instructions were given in that answer, and no intimation was conveyed in it that the Address contained a proposal the principle of which the Government must condemn. It was not, indeed, until five months afterwards that his predecessor had deemed it necessary to express his opinion to the colony on the subject of the Address, and that opinion, sent out in December, contained the information that its prayer could not be complied with. A correspondence with Sir Charles Darling, which extended over many months, was afterwards communicated to the colony, accompanied by a letter from the Under Secretary of State, warning the Governor distinctly that any grant whatsoever to any member of his family must be looked upon as a grant to himself, and that he could not remain in the colonial service if he were to accept any such grant. He had, therefore, before him the facts that two or three warnings had been given to Sir Charles Darling, plainly intimating to him that such a grant could not be allowed to be accepted by him without the forfeiture of his position in the colonial service, as well as all prospect of future employment or pension under the Crown; and, on the other hand, that the colonists had been told that the prayer of their Address, asking to be permitted to make the grant, must be refused. Under those circumstances, he could not see, when the subject came under his notice how any further remonstrances were likely to be productive of the slightest effect, or what power he had to enforce such remonstrances

Lord Lyveden

if made. The noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) with regard to the latter point admitted that the question of the power of such enforcement turned on the interpretation of the clause in the Constitution Act, in accordance with which all money grants in the colony must originate with the Governor in the same way as in the House of Commons grants of money must originate, in accordance with the Standing Orders, with the responsible Ministers of the Crown. Now, it might be said that under the operation of that clause the Governor could have withheld his assent altogether from the Vote recommended by his responsible advisers; and he (the Duke of Buckingham) was not prepared to contend that such a power might not exist. It was not a power, however, which had been used in the way in which it was suggested it might have been used in the present instance. The origin of the clause in the Constitution Act had, in fact, been ascribed to the expediency of protecting the colonists from claims for unprofitable or reckless grants for local purposes, or not of importance to the colony at large; and, although there might be, theoretically speaking, such a power as that to which he had just alluded, he did not believe that it was a power which could be practically enforced unless its exercise happened to be in accordance with the general feeling of the colonists themselves. He, at all events, did not think that it could be exercised in opposition to the will of their Legislature. It did not under those circumstances appear to him desirable that he should, in relation to the particular grant in question, enter into a dispute with the colony, of which the end could not be easily foreseen, and which must assume the form of an attempt on the part of the Imperial Government to endeavour to coerce the full representative Government which had been given to the colony. That was the conclusion at which he had arrived; although he felt at the same time that the grant was one which was objectionable in principle, and which if carried into effect would tend to do serious harm to the colonial service. He was aware that the great mass of the people of the colony were in favour, for various reasons, of the grant to Lady Darling, and he thought the noble Lord who preceded him at the Colonial Office (the Earl of Carnarvon) had adopted a wise course in not doing that which he himself had abstained from doing—taking the extreme step of advising the Governor not to submit such a Vote, when proposed, to the consideration of the Legislative Council. The noble Lord (Lord Lyveden) had, he might add, called attention to two extracts from the despatches which he (the Duke of Buckingham) had written, which he seemed to think were completely contradictory. He stated that in the despatch of the 1st of January the Governor was warned that he ought not, in a certain event, to recommend the Vote except on the understanding that it was brought before the Council. The noble Lord appeared to think that was quite at variance with the paragraph in the despatch of October, in which it was stated that as Sir Charles Darling was no longer in the service of the Crown it would not be right for him, as Secretary of State, or for the Governor, to express any opinion on the proposed grant to Lady Darling. As to the despatch of January 1, if that Vote had been attempted to be passed in either of the different forms in which it had been submitted, and if Sir Henry Manners Sutton's Ministers had failed in passing it either in a separate form or by including it in the Appropriation Act, and if after a dissolution they also failed, it did not appear to him expedient that Sir Henry Manners Sutton's Ministers should present that grant again in the same form, if they should think it right to submit it again. Therefore he gave the Governor the instructions referred to on the 1st of January; but those instructions in no way prevented him from continuing to submit the grant, and they did not seem to him in any way at variance with what he wrote in October, stating that, as Sir Charles Darling was no longer in the service of the Crown, it would be right neither for the Secretary of State nor for the Governor to express any opinion on the proposed grant to Lady Darling. That passage had been a good deal criticized by the noble Lord, who asked why it was not right either for the Secretary of State or the Governor to express an opinion on that grant under those particular circumstances. Sir Charles Darling had ceased to be in the service of the Crown. He must either in that matter have been looked upon as a private individual or as a person coming within the scope of the regulation as to Governors either holding or leaving their posts. If Sir Charles Darling was merely a private individual in the colony, it certainly would not have been a case, according to constitutional practice, for the Crown to have interfered by the expression of any opinion on the question of a grant proposed to be made in accordance with public opinion by a colony with free representative institutions. If, on the other hand, Sir Charles Darling was a member of the colonial service, and to be regarded as a person falling within the operation of the regulation for Governors holding office or about to leave it, then it was not expedient for him (the Duke of Marlborough) as Secretary of State to express any opinion on the question of the grant, because the very case that had occurred, or even a stronger one, had been distinctly provided for in the instructions given to Sir Henry Manners Sutton on assuming office in the colony. By the Constitution Act it was prescribed that no money votes should be considered except those introduced by the responsible Ministers of the Crown with the sanction of the Governor. No Bill containing any money grant could therefore reach the Council unless it had been so initiated, and that was the power which the noble Lord thought ought to have been used in that particular case. But it would have been very difficult to have used it in such a case, and he (the Duke of Buckingham) thought he was right in saying in his despatch that they ought to express no opinion on the question, because the instructions under which Sir Henry Manners Sutton was acting in the colony contained almost a positive direction to him not to interfere at such a stage in such a grant. He said "almost contained," because, though they did not contain that positive direction, they, in fact, provided for the very case that had occurred, which he looked upon as that of a grant to a Governor. In Sir Henry Manners Sutton's instructions there was a direction that, should any Bill containing a grant of money or land for a Governor be brought up for assent, it should be reserved for the approval of the Home Government. It seemed to him that he could not supersede that instruction. The instruction that the Governor was to reserve such a measure for assent distinctly implied that he must have sanctioned its initiation, otherwise no such Bill could be brought up for that assent. When he found those instructions in the hands of an able Governor, as Sir Henry Manners Sutton had been deemed, that he had been sent out expressly to deal with the difficulties connected with Sir Charles Darling's conduct in Victoria, and that those instructions were given not by himself nor by the present Government, but by a right hon. Gentleman who formally held the seals of the Colonial Department (Sir William Molesworth), it did not appear to him that he ought to express any opinion adverse to those instructions, or attempt at a distance involving a three or four months' correspondence, to direct the Governor further on a matter the position of which was daily and weekly changing. The reasons, therefore, why he had sent no further instructions, in the first instance, than merely to communicate the letter of Sir Charles Darling were that it appeared to him that letter was merely the confirmation of what had already been communicated, that his predecessor had dealt with the Address on that subject. On the general question of the relations between this country and the colonies it also seemed to him most inexpedient that they should hastily enter on questions on which a strong feeling existed in the colony, on questions which did not vitally affect the interests of this country, and on questions such as those in which our own regulations failed to prohibit the person from accepting such a grant. He thought that by giving free representative institutions to those colonies we had practically placed ourselves in the position rather of guiders than of rulers, that our rule must be guided strictly by the terms of the Act under which their constitutions were established, and by the general instructions given to Governors in regard to their management; and that to attempt hastily to vary those instructions, to exceed in any degree the limits under which they usually conceded representative institutions, was a course full of danger and certain eventually to result in raising feelings in the colonies inimical to that continued union and affection in regard to this country which it was the interest of this country and also he believed both the interest and the desire of the colonists to cherish. It appeared to him that that question at the stage at which it passed under his supervision could not have been stopped but by a course of action that would inevitably have raised a conflict between this country and that colony; and the question was not one, in his judgment, that would have been a sufficient justification for our entering into such a dispute. No doubt, the principle of the grant was an objectionable one; and he thought it was much to be regretted that when those Constitution

The Duke of Buckingham

Acts were passed, such presents and grants had not been absolutely forbidden; and, also, that it was a misfortune that such instructions were not given originally, when those representative institutions were established, to the Governors who were to administer them, as would have prevented the proposal of such grants. But he (the Duke of Buckingham) had had to deal, not with that which he thought was desirable, but with the facts as they stood. It seemed to him that it would not have been wise to have taken such a course as would have turned what was now a question between two branches of the Colonial Legislature into a conflict between this country and the colony. The Government had been censured for not having expressed a more decided opinion; but the state of feeling in the Colony was such that there was no prospect of success without causing something more than irritation; and he believed that, when the matter was concluded, instead of being censured for not taking more decided steps, the Government deserved to be thanked for averting a dispute between this country and the colony. It was impossible for him to say what answer he should give to the despatches until he had received them, although he admitted the general purport of those despatches had been telegraphed. It was not possible for him to give instructions to the colony upon a matter of this importance until full intelligence had been received; and even then it would not be expedient to fetter the Governor with instructions which must be framed three months in advance of the circumstances they were intended to meet. It seemed to him that the best reliance this country could have for the safe government of the colonies and the maintenance of the authority of the Crown was to select, as had been done by Mr. Cardwell, able and good men as Governors, and to give them before leaving this country the fullest possible instructions; but to avoid, as much as possible, fettering them with instructions which must be based on suppositions, and could not be based upon facts.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the statement of the noble Duke (the Duke of Buckingham) in reiteration of the opinion expressed by him some nights ago—that, on the merits of the case, this Vote of the Legislative Assembly of Victoria was highly inexpedient, and involved a principle dangerous to the connection between the mother country and the colony—had very much narrowed the ground of difference between the noble Duke and those who dissented from the course he had taken. It had, however, narrowed it to a point of the highest importance as regarded the administration of the Crown over colonies enjoying constitutional government. The noble Duke had explained his course with great moderation and perfect candour; and his position was that in dealing with a colony possessing a full constitutional system it was impossible for the Crown to resist the colony, if such a Vote were proposed to a Governor who had acted in accordance with the wishes of the Assembly. That was a very dangerous principle to lay down. No one would go further than himself in accepting the doctrine of colonial freedom. It had now come to this—that there was hardly any question affecting the internal government of the colony, even, although the measures adopted should be injurious to the interests of the mother country, upon which, if those measures were bond fide directed to the regulation of their own affairs, it would be expedient for the Imperial Government to resist the final decision of the colonial Assembly. Instead of receiving from our colonies any special commercial advantages, which used to be considered almost the sole value of the colonies, we now allowed the colonists to adopt fiscal systems which were directly injurious to our own commerce. The truth was that our connection with the colonies was now almost reduced, in the case, at least, of colonies having the possession of a Parliamentary system, to the nomination of their Governors; and he would venture to maintain that this remaining tie was retained in their interests, and not in those of the mother country. It saved them from the evils of Presidential Elections, and placed over them a Governor who was above all party contentions, and who represented the dignity and the impartiality of the Imperial Crown. Now, the object of the rule laid down by the Colonial Office that colonial Governors should never receive from the colonies any Vote of money or grant of land, or any other bribe which might influence their conduct, was to maintain the impartiality of the Governor and the purity of the relations between the Imperial Crown and the colony, and to secure that the Governor should never be tempted by pecuniary or selfish considerations to become a mere partizan in the contentions of the colonial Assemblies. That was a rule having reference solely to Imperial considerations, and it was a rule which we ought not to allow the colonies to break through whenever a chance majority of the Assembly might be inclined to do so, in order to reward a Governor who might be supposed to be a partizan of their own. He did not wish to say a single harsh word in regard to the conduct of Sir Charles Darling. It was enough to say that his recall by Mr. Secretary Cardwell was assented to not only by his own party, but by all parties in both Houses of Parliament; and if there were any hardship in his case—if it were necessary for the ends of justice that the question should be re-considered—and that compensation should be given to him for that which was an error of judgment committed under difficult and peculiar circumstances—that investigation ought to have been made at home, and that compensation given to him also at home. It was clearly contrary to Imperial policy that any compensation should be voted by a colony to a Governor, and the question was whether an exception should have been made in the particular case of Sir Charles Darling. No one had described in stronger language than the noble Duke the danger of the quarrel between the two Houses of the Legislature as regarded the maintenance of the existing Constitution of the colony. It was commonly supposed by many who had not read the papers that this was a mere continuation of the old quarrel between the two Houses respecting subjects of internal taxation, one party being favourable to protective duties, and another in favour of Free Trade. But the quarrel that had now arisen between the two Houses of Legislature was on a wholly separate question from that which had been the subject of difference two years ago. It was a new quarrel got up, originated, and caused entirely by the mistaken action of the Colonial Office at home. It had arisen in fact out of the initiative taken by the noble Duke.

The Duke of Argyll

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM: I did not take the initiative.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL would maintain that the course taken by the noble Duke did amount to giving the initiative of the Crown to a Vote come to by the House of Assembly. The circumstances were these—when the news of the recall of Sir Charles Darling was received in the colony, the Legislative Assembly agreed to an Address proposing a Vote of £20,000 to Sir Charles Darling, or rather to Lady Darling, not by way of Bill, but from the Estimates. The noble Duke had laid some stress on the despatch of the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon); but he put a very strained interpretation on the noble Earl's language, because the despatch distinctly intimated that the Colonial Office would give no assent to the introduction of such a Vote into either House of Legislature. It pointed out that such a Vote would be at variance with Imperial principles and the Regulations of the Colonial Office, and that its acceptance would imply that Sir Charles Darling had entirely relinquished the colonial service.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM: Will the noble Duke give me the date of that despatch?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, the despatch, which was the first sent out by the Colonial Office after learning the proposal of a grant to Lady Darling, was dated the 8th of December, 1866. After reciting the rule of the Office precluding the receipt of grants by colonial Governors—either during office or after resigning—it pointed out that that rule would be rendered nugatory if such grants could be awarded to a Governor's wife. It added—

“It is, under these circumstances, impossible that Her Majesty should be advised to sanction the literal or substantial violation of this rule by any of her servants; or, on the other hand, that the acceptance of the proposed grant should be regarded as otherwise than as a final relinquishment by Sir Charles Darling of that service, and of all the emoluments or expectations attaching to it.”

Now, it did not appear to him that these words necessarily implied any sanction to the Vote even in the event of Sir Charles Darling retiring from the colonial service. That case was indeed mentioned contingently, but not as a contingency which was contemplated as likely to arise. Indeed, he believed that, within a few days after the noble Earl had written the despatch, he was applied to by Sir Charles Darling for another appointment. The despatch referred to his retirement rather as a contingency not to be expected.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM asked the noble Duke to refer to a letter written by Sir Charles Darling in the previous October.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL admitted that in the course of the correspondence, Sir Charles Darling might have alluded to the contingency of his retirement from the colonial service; but all he (the Duke of Argyll) contended for was that the noble Duke, having this despatch of his predecessor before him, was in no respect bound by any opinion therein expressed, but was perfectly free to decide what course should be taken in the event of that contingency being realized. Now, while in this country it was only an invariable rule of Parliamentary practice that no grant could be initiated, except by the Ministers of the Crown, in the colonies this rule was laid down by statute. Sir Charles Darling intimated his intention finally to retire from office, avowedly for the purpose of receiving this Vote, and it was under these circumstances that the question came before the noble Duke. It seemed to him that the despatch of the noble Duke of the 10th of May did amount to giving the initiative of the Crown to this grant, because it simply intimated, with reference to the despatch of his predecessor, that Sir Charles Darling had elected to retire from the service altogether; and if it was not intended to express any opinion on the subject the only object could be to throw the whole responsibility on the colonial Government. His (the Duke of Argyll's) interpretation that that despatch was an intimation of the consent of the Crown, was confirmed by the fact that on its receipt the Governor at once concluded that the noble Duke meant him to allow the discussion of the Vote in the Legislative Assembly, which could only be done by the consent, and at the initiative of the Crown. There were two questions for consideration—one whether such a grant should be proposed at all, and the other in what form it should be proposed. Now, this new quarrel between the two Houses had arisen, not merely from the grant itself, but also from the form in which it was proposed. The Vote was, in fact, a party Vote, intended to compensate Sir Charles Darling for what was regarded both in the Colony and at home as partizanship, and to fix a stigma on those Members of the Legislative Council who had opposed him; yet, under these circumstances, the £20,000 was inserted in the Estimates and included in the Appropriation Bill, being the most offensive course towards the Council which could have been adopted. The next despatch of the noble Duke was dated the 1st of January last, by which time he had apparently discovered the mistake he had made in allowing the re-opening of the question, or had at least become alive to the objectionable form in which the Vote had been proposed. Accordingly, in that despatch he expressed regret at the vote having been included in the Appropriation Bill; it being a grant exceptional in its character, and notoriously obnoxious to a large portion of the Legislative Council, and he condemned any attempt to coerce the Council into sanctioning it. If, he added, the Vote were considered at all, it should be in the form of a separate Bill, for under those circumstances the Council would not feel the same sense of unconstitutional treatment. Now, if the noble Duke felt so strongly the unconstitutional form of a "tack," why had he not at least told the Governor to insist, in the event of the Vote being introduced, on its being proposed in the form of a Bill, so as to place no unconstitutional duress on the Legislative Council? These were matters entirely under the control of the Colonial Office, and he regretted that the noble Duke, by taking the initiative and giving the consent of the Crown first to the introduction of the Vote at all, and next without any condition as to its form, had revived the quarrel between the two Houses which, in April, 1866, had been brought to a happy issue. He protested, too, against the noble Duke's argument that in the case of colonies enjoying constitutional government, we were unable to defend even our own honour with regard to the purity of the Governors sent to represent the Imperial Government. Such language was most dangerous for any Minister of the Crown to hold, and he hoped what had occurred in this case, would be a lesson to Colonial Secretaries not to allow, under any circumstances, the infraction of a rule which was clearly of Imperial importance and value, laid down solely with the view of preserving the honour of the Crown and the purity of its representatives in the colonies.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the earliest steps of these transactions had been sufficiently explained by the previous speakers to render any detailed reference to them unnecessary. The quarrel arose, as had been described, in 1864. In 1865 a majority of the Legislative Assembly passed a Protectionist Tariff, and, anticipating the opposition of the Council, the members of which were mostly Free-traders, they first levied the new scale of duties by simple Resolutions—a course utterly unwarrantable—and then tacked the Tariff to the Appropriation Bill. That

The Duke of Argyll

Appropriation Bill Council. Meanwhile continued to levy the Resolutions. After the public creditors adopted a system of defensible, and called judicial to the inter system of confessing judgment to go came before the Senate was, without hesitation, a course was illegal, the two Houses met an Address, signed, the Council, by a influential men forwarded to the Crown in transmitting that it a statement to the not feel himself at his councils any measures were appended Cardwell, the then the Colonies, justly statement, and Sir recalled on that ground alone. The affairs when he (the received the seals of Meanwhile, the difficulty Houses had undergone compromise, and the appropriation Bill had been then arose the question grant to Lady Darling, Sir Charles Darling, case that he was. Now he had been too guarded in the returned on receipt, ment of that grant. first place observe to the gravity of the ing well, though he a fortnight at the bitter was the feeling was loth even in some question in which interested. Sir Charles arrived in England, sued, and he thought responsiveness ought to at least to a close be himself as being in the part of the Crown haps, observe that, monstrosities and aim he received no less personal applications

Charles Darling; and if, in the course of a correspondence which grew into a most voluminous bulk, he had overlooked or neglected to deal with any point, the enormous mass of papers with which he had to deal really furnished him with some excuse. On the 28th of August Sir Charles Darling prayed for a tribunal to inquire into the circumstances of his recall. In answer he (the Earl of Carnarvon) declined to appoint any such extraordinary tribunal. On the 11th of September Sir Charles Darling prayed to be appointed to a position of equal rank and dignity to that of Victoria. On the 28th of September he requested half salary from the day of his leaving the colony to the arrival of Sir Henry Manners Sutton. In his reply he (the Earl of Carnarvon) regretted that he could not comply for technical reasons. On the 30th of October Sir Charles Darling requested the £20,000, which might be divided among his children. His (the Earl of Carnarvon's) reply was that he could not qualify his original view. On the 24th of October Sir Charles Darling requested full pension, an application which he declined to entertain at the time for technical reasons. On the 4th of November Sir Charles Darling requested a review of his recall in reference to a judgment of the Privy Council, to which he (the Earl of Carnarvon) answered that he must adhere to the conclusion which he had already expressed. On the 3rd of December Sir Charles Darling applied for the government of New South Wales; and in reply he (the Earl of Carnarvon) stated that it was not then vacant. On the 18th of January Sir Charles Darling wrote to ask whether Her Majesty's Government would oppose a petition to Parliament. Upon that point he (the Earl of Carnarvon) declined to give any pledge. The real questions that came before him were—whether the grant should be allowed; and, secondly, if so, the form in which the grant should be proposed. Now, with regard to the first question, he informed Sir Charles Darling and the Government of Victoria that it was impossible for Her Majesty's Government to be a party to that vote. He would not enter into a discussion of the Colonial Regulation, which he regarded as one that was very just and right, for that subject had been fully dwelt upon in the course of the debate; but, in order to place his case clearly before the House, he would trouble them with one extract, and only one, because he thought that, by so doing, he could clearly show the view which he then entertained. On the 12th of October, by his directions, Mr. Adderley sent the following despatch to Sir Charles Darling:—

"Lord Carnarvon sincerely regrets the severe pecuniary loss which your premature recall has entailed upon you; and it would have been personally gratifying to him to have been the channel of commutation in conveying the Crown's sanction to your acceptance of the proposed grant. But, after a careful study of the Regulations in question, and of the reasons on which they are founded, Lord Carnarvon is forced to come to the conclusion that the rule was framed with the distinct intention of including such cases as the present, and that he could not now relax it without sanctioning an indefinite relaxation in other cases. Its principle is, that no Governor shall be allowed to expose himself to the temptation which may arise from exporting beneficial donations from the colonists, or any section of them, or to the suspicions which arise from his acceptance of such donations. Whether they are made directly to himself, or in trust for him, or to some member of his family, so that he may have the enjoyment of them, is obviously immaterial. The proposed grant, as, indeed, you appear to admit, is palpably a gift to yourself through Lady Darling. It may not transgress the rule in its letter, but would be a manifest evasion of its principle. It is for the interest of the public service that this principle should be firmly adhered to; and, under these circumstances, Lord Carnarvon is bound to withhold his consent, and distinctly to inform you that, if you desire to retain your connection with the colonial service of this country, you are not free to accept the vote. Lord Carnarvon sincerely wishes that he could come to any other decision; but he is clear that this is his duty, though a very painful one."

In everything he had written he (the Earl of Carnarvon) sincerely compassionated the condition in which Sir Charles Darling was placed, and desired to avoid the use of any harsh expression towards him; but he submitted that there was nothing equivocal in the language which he employed. He stated distinctly that, if Sir Charles Darling accepted this grant, he would forfeit all claims to retain his connection with the colonial service of this country. Now, he contended that when his noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies wrote that Sir Charles Darling had "elected finally to relinquish the colonial service," the words employed unintentionally involved a misrepresentation of his intentions. When a superior officer informed his subordinate that he could not take a certain course without certain effects resulting, it could not be said that he thereby gave him an option as to which course he could pursue, any more than the law made it optional for a man to commit a crime or not because it attached a penalty to the commission of the crime. If the noble Duke (the Duke of Buckingham) entertained any doubt as to his intentions, it would have been easy enough for him to have applied to him, and to have asked him what his views were in writing that despatch. He was at a loss to understand how Sir Henry Manners Sutton brought himself to lay the Vote before the Assembly, because there was certainly nothing in the despatches of the noble Duke to warrant it, unless papers had passed which were not before the House. The noble Duke the Secretary for the Colonies said that he was justified in the course he had taken by the fact that he (the Earl of Carnarvon) had not told the Governor that he was not at liberty to recommend this Vote. The truth was he had never contemplated such a proceeding on the part of the Governor. Had he thought for a moment that such a course would have been adopted by Sir Henry Manners Sutton, he should not have been content with a mere correspondence upon the subject; he should have felt it to be his duty to put upon paper in the most distinct terms he could have commanded the course he thought it would be right for the Governor of the colony to pursue under the circumstances. He agreed with the noble Lord that, at so great a distance as we are from Australia, it was impossible for the Colonial Office to regulate every minute detail in the conduct of the Governor of the colony; but, at the same time, they should give him such general directions as would serve to guide him in the course he should pursue. The noble Duke the Secretary for the Colonies made use of words, the import of which, he thought, he could scarcely have fully appreciated. The noble Duke said that whatever theoretical right the Colonial Office might have to interpose in such a case, such a right had practically ceased to exist. He begged to express his entire dissent from that view. The right of the Crown to interfere in such a case not only existed in theory but in practice; and if the Advisers of the Crown were assured that any constitutional principle were being violated, it would be their duty to interpose the veto of the Crown, and they ought not to shrink from the performance of that duty for fear of raising any difficulty between the colony and this country. It could scarcely, however, have been the intention of the noble Duke that the words he used should bear the interpretation

The Earl of Carnarvon

they had put upon them. The meaning of the noble Duke probably was to intimate that, in a critical case such as that which had occurred in Victoria, it might be necessary for the Secretary of State to use those powers which belonged to him to induce the contending parties to come to some compromise, and thus to settle a question full of danger and difficulty. There was a point, beyond which the Secretary for the Colonies could not go; and there was a point beyond which he ought not to go. Supposing, for instance, that a public subscription had been voluntarily raised at Victoria, on behalf of the Governor, as a private individual when stripped of his office, it would undoubtedly have been impossible for the Crown to have interfered, and Sir Charles Darling, if so disposed, might have been perfectly free to have accepted it—except so far as his conscience was concerned. Of course, there was also a limit beyond which the Minister of the Crown might consider whether it was his duty to go upon a point of this sort. The question also arose, in what form the Secretary of State, when he did interfere, was to deal with the question, and in such a case the form would probably be the very essence of the matter. He could understand a Secretary of State—seeing the difficulty that existed in a colony like Victoria, seeing the suspension of all legislation and public works, and seeing the state of anarchy and confusion which existed there—saying that, under these circumstances, he need not pledge the Crown to an obstinate antagonism to the wishes of the colony, and that both parties having got themselves into a false position, it was his duty as far as possible, without violating the rights of the Crown, to find some mode by which he could extract them from the position in which they were placed. The course adopted, however, was not calculated to have that effect, and was not altogether consistent with the position in which the Crown ought to be placed in the colonies. The noble Duke the Colonial Secretary stated in one of his despatches that it was necessary, as a formal step, that the Governor should lay the Vote before the two Houses of the Colonial Legislature. He demurred to that entirely. There was another way in which the matter might have been dealt with far more satisfactorily. The Governor should not have laid the matter before the Assembly exclusively. An Address, in favour of the proposal, might have been proposed in both Houses by the colonial Minister, and sent up to the Governor, praying him to make a formal recommendation. Had that course been adopted, and had the Lower House been induced to abandon the pernicious system of "tacking," both Houses might have joined in a general Address to the Governor, and the matter would have stood in a very different position. He demurred altogether to the proposition of the noble Lord, that the course that was adopted was the one best calculated to bring the matter under the consideration of the Crown. He was aware that there were some noble Lords who had spoken that evening, who thought that under no circumstances should there have been a relaxation of the rule. He admitted that there was a good deal to be said in favour of that view of the case; but at the same time, in justice to the noble Duke the Colonial Secretary, he must say that, in this country, we could scarcely form an estimate how severe the struggle in Victoria had been with respect to this matter. Sir Henry Manners Sutton, in one of his recent despatches, used these remarkable words—

"I do not conceal from your Grace the fact, not the less certain because it is lamentable, that a conflict such as that which is now in progress strains the Constitution of the colony, and I cannot assert that the Constitution will endure this strain if it should be prolonged."

It was very rarely indeed, in the recent history of colonial administration, that any colonial Governor had penned such a despatch as that; and the House was bound to suppose that it had not been written without a full sense of the importance which would be attached to its words. The position was, therefore, a very grave one. It was evident that confusion was growing into anarchy, and that the state of affairs might result in breaking up the Constitution and unfixing the foundations of civil government. What events occurred subsequent to this transaction? On the 7th July the Governor made his recommendation to the House of Assembly to pass the measure, which was agreed to and tacked on to the Appropriation Bill and sent up to the Council. The Council naturally objected to the proceeding, and then ensued the confusion which was so much to be deplored. On the 2nd of October the Governor, taking what appeared to be a still more objectionable course, recommended to both Houses the adoption of the measure. Under these circumstances, as might have been expected, the grant was rejected by the Council. In the meantime it was necessary to carry on the business of the year, it was necessary to find Ways and Means; and accordingly what he must call the old dodge was had recourse to—the Attorney General instructed the public servants to bring their actions against the State for any money due to them. These actions were brought, judgment was confessed, and the Governor was invited to sign the necessary warrants. But a collateral issue was raised on some other point; it was taken up to the Supreme Court, which pronounced a judgment which invalidated the whole proceeding. That judgment declared first of all that these payments were absolutely illegal, and that the Governor when he signed the warrants committed an illegal act. This was a very unseemly and discreditable state of things. To sum up the whole case, he—while admitting that there had been difficulties in the way of his noble Friend the noble Duke and of Sir Henry Manners Sutton—felt bound to say that he regretted the course taken by the Governor proprio motu; he regretted the form he had adopted; he regretted that the system of confessing judgments, which had been so strongly denounced by Mr. Cardwell in a very similar case, had ever been allowed in the colony; he regretted that his noble Friend the noble Duke had written despatches of rather ambiguous character; he regretted and strongly condemned the system of "tacking." No course could be taken more utterly inconsistent with the freedom of discussion. He could not understand how the noble Duke could speak so mildly of this as he had done in one of his despatches. He thought there was a fresh cause of regret in the unsatisfactory mode in which the legislative constituencies of the colonies were created, no securities being laid down which would prevent such a deadlock as had occurred. If that system was to be maintained, the just power and authority of the Council ought to be upheld; for if it was not upheld it would be far safer for the colony to have but one single Chamber of the Legislature. Nothing could be more dangerous than having a nominal responsibility vested in a second Chamber, which practically was never exercised. In view of all this correspondence he must bear witness to the extremely difficult position in which colonial Governors often found themselves.

Questions must from time to time arise which required not merely general knowledge of constitutional law, but of technical and professional details, which few could command. Their advisers were taken out of their own Governments and pledged to one political party in the colony. It was his fixed determination, had he remained in Office, to strive as earnestly as possible for the appointment of some one permanent and impartial legal adviser, who might be in a position to advise a colonial Governor as emergencies arose. He could not say that he regretted this discussion; he was satisfied that, conducted as it had been with so much temper, it would be useful to the colonies. No one could doubt the great wealth and prosperity of those colonies. He trusted they would fortify themselves by wise and useful legislation; that they would avoid presenting a spectacle so little seemly as that which, in the present instance, had been recently exhibited; that they would avoid the clash and antagonism of two Houses, and become models of that constitutional regard for liberty and law which distinguished this country.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he had been unwilling to stand in the way of the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) when he rose to address the House on this question, in which he naturally took so deep an interest; but he was anxious to enter at the earliest possible opportunity his protest against the constitutional doctrine which had been laid down by the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), who, he was sorry to see, had now left the House. He regretted also that his noble Friend who had just sat down had lent his countenance to that doctrine; for he ventured to say it was a doctrine which required most careful consideration at their Lordships' hands, because upon the propriety or impropriety of it depended the whole question of the free action of those constitutional institutions which had been granted to our colonies. Referring first to the question of policy with regard to a grant of money such as was proposed to Lady Darling, on that question they were fortunately all agreed. There was no one of their Lordships, he believed, who did not think that the rule of the colonial service on this subject was founded on considerations of the highest expediency, and that it ought to be maintained and enforced, so far as there was power to maintain and enforce it. But he asked them to bear in mind that the rule was, after all, only a rule of the service. It was not the law of the land. It was a rule very properly laid down in the circular despatch of Sir William Molesworth which had been referred to; but which the Government of Her Majesty could only enforce by treating any departure from or infringement of it as a forfeiture of all claim to future colonial employment. Many years ago, at the end of last century, when the subject of receiving presents from the Natives of India had attracted, for a well-known reason, great attention in this country, a law was passed dealing with the case of India; but it had never been extended to the colonies. The India Act of 1793 was extremely stringent and emphatic. It provided that the receiving by any Governor or any officer in India any present either to himself or any other person, under any colour or pretext, should be punished as a high crime and misdemeanour, subject to severe penalties, while the present itself should be forfeited to the Crown. There was no such law applicable to our colonies. There was a wholesome rule which applied to the subject; but there was nothing obligatory. The proposition made in the colony was to make a benefaction to the family of Sir Charles Darling, which might be highly impolitic, but would not be illegal or contrary to any Imperial statute. The majority of the Legislative Assembly and the Ministry of the colony being anxious to make a grant of that kind, what is the position of things at home? And here he took issue directly with the doctrine of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), supported as it was by the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon). The noble Duke said there were no means by which the Crown could preserve the purity of the reputation of its colonial Governors, or restrain, in cases which affected Imperial interests, the action of the colonial Legislatures by its veto. There were constitutional means by which that could be done. But the issue was, where was the point, where was the stage, at which the Government of the mother country could step in and interpose, and before which that interference would be in contravention of the free action of the colonial Government? Sir Henry Manners Sutton had a Ministry possessing the confidence of a preponderating majority of the Legislative Assembly. He knew—and he had made the experiment—that any attempt to form a Ministry in opposition to the Legislative Assembly must necessarily fail. He was therefore reduced practically to the option of placing confidence in his Ministry, or having no Ministry at all. That Ministry came to him and said, "Here are the Estimates of the year, and one of the things we mean to propose is a grant of £20,000 to Lady Darling, which we conceive the Queen thinks to be impolitic, and which the Government thinks is impolitic; but the Assembly insists on bringing it forward." If they laid down the rule that the Secretary of State of the mother country was to hold the leading strings of the Ministry of the Colony, to settle the system, and to tell them what they might propose and what they might not propose, then he (the Lord Chancellor) said, that the pretence of free colonial institutions was a delusion and a mockery. Unless they could supply the means—and he knew no such power in the Constitution—of providing the Governor of the colony with a new Ministry, who would command the confidence of the Legislative Assembly, and would be able to carry on the government of the colony, he must at that stage—and, mark, he said, only at that stage—take the advice tendered to him by his Ministry and allow the Legislative Assembly and the Council the opportunity of discussing measures which the Ministry proposed to bring forward. And when the 57th section of the Colonial Constitution Act was referred to, he begged to say the section had been entirely misapprehended. That section was only a repetition of a Standing Order of the English House of Commons—that no Vote of public money should be proposed except by the responsible Advisers of the Crown. And what was the object of the section in the colony? It was not to settle the relations of the Governor and his Ministry. It was to prevent Members of the Legislative Assembly, not being Members of the Government proposing the expenditure of the public money, and for that alone. Therefore when the noble Duke said, and his noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon) repeated, that it was the duty of the Home Government, at this stage, to have directed the Governor of the colony to place his veto on the introduction of any proposition to the Legislative Assembly of the Vote to Lady Darling, he (the Lord Chancellor) said that, unless with a view to dispense with his Ministry, that was counsel which no Government could agree to. No Government would remain in Office unless they had the confidence of the Governor of the colony, and the power of introducing measures to the Legislature which they deemed to be for the good of the commonwealth. This was the sole question in the case—the point of time at which the Governor of the colony should interpose to prevent free discussion. When a measure had passed the two Houses and was presented for the assent of the Governor, then the working of the institutions of the colony was in harmony with the working of the institutions of this country. No doubt the proposed grant was in opposition to the rule of the Colonial Office, but it was not within the spirit of the Constitution that such a measure should not be allowed to be discussed. What were the instructions given to a Governor of a colony? He held in his hand the instructions of Mr. Cardwell, sent out with Sir Henry Manners Sutton, that there was a certain class of measures with regard to which he was, unless he thought fit at once to refuse the Royal Assent, to withhold that Assent, and refer the measures to the Government at home. And one of the class of measures was this—any Bill whereby any grant of money or gratuity may be made to a colonial servant. His noble Friend said it was the duty of the Home Government not to allow any such measure to be considered. He (the Lord Chancellor) said that that was not the spirit of the Constitution of the colony. The spirit of the Constitution was that there should be free discussion. Let the Ministry who have the confidence of the Assembly propose a measure, and let it be discussed, and if one Chamber or the two Chambers rejected it there was an end of the measure; but if both Chambers passed it, then, and then only, it was for the Home Government to form their judgment and to say whether the Assent of the Crown ought to be refused. He desired to refer to history in order to correct a misapprehension into which some noble Lords had fallen as to what took place when the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) was Secretary of State. He thought there was nothing in what the noble Earl did open in any degree to misunderstanding or censure. He was really responsible only for this—for the answer given by him to the Address forwarded for presentation to Her Majesty. But what was the character of that Address? What was proposed was, that Her Majesty should be asked by the Address emanating from the Legislative Assembly, entreating Her Majesty to give permission to Sir Charles Darling to accept on the part of his family the proposed present—it was not to ask Her Majesty to give assent to any legislative measure to be proposed—it was to relax the rule of the colonial service and to allow Sir Charles Darling, although retaining office, to accept a gratuity that was proposed, and it is to that extent the answer given by the noble Earl was the answer that ought to be given, because the answer was that the rule that a Governor should not receive presents was laid down in the Colonial Regulations. It was under these circumstances impossible that Her Majesty should be asked to violate those Regulations, and that the acceptance of the present would be regarded as a relinquishment of his Governorship by Sir Charles Darling. It was refused, and properly refused. And what then took place? Sir Charles Darling, after some correspondence, proposed to leave the service, and to forfeit any expectations of any future employment under the Crown. With regard to the grant, the question was, as he had before stated, what was the proper time for the interposition of the Home Government. He (the Lord Chancellor) ventured to think that, it being proposed by the Ministry of the colony to introduce a Bill or an Estimate on the subject, it would have been entirely premature, before it was known what the Colonial Legislature would do with it, for the Secretary of State to enter into a speculation, and say, if such a Bill were passed, he was to take such and such a view of the case. And what was done? The Ministry—the Colonial Ministry—thought Sir Henry Manners Sutton told them they were entitled to place on the Estimates a Vote of this kind. The Governor imposed no impediment in the way of the Vote being considered. He expressed, however, no approval of the measure; on the contrary, by a memorandum he put on record his doubts of its policy. The Estimate was proposed and carried by the Legislative Assembly. And here again he must take leave to differ from the view of the subject which had been expressed by his noble Friend who had just sat down. His noble Friend contended that it was a great mistake to have a “tack” to a Bill which was sent up to the Upper House. But he seemed to forget that there was no

The Earl of Carnarvon

The Lord Chancellor

“tack” at all in the case. A “tack” meant the addition by the Lower Chamber to a Money Bill of something which had nothing to do with such a measure. What, however, was done in the instance under discussion was, the Estimates being agreed to, to make a grant to Lady Darling, and to include the whole in the Appropriation Bill. In fact, that which was done in the colony was nothing more than was constantly done at home. The whole of the Supplies were included in the Appropriation Bill of the year, and were thus sent up to the Upper House. But that having occurred once, a similar circumstance would in all probability never occur again; for his noble Friend at the head of the Colonial Office had very strongly urged on the Governor of the colony the expediency of so arranging with his Ministry that should the proposal to make the grant be renewed, it should, as it were, be isolated from the rest of the Estimates, and be made the subject of a separate measure, so that it might go up to the Upper Chamber in that shape, and that its rejection by them might not interfere with the general Supplies of the year. That, he thought, was very wholesome advice; but then it was advice which might possibly be pressed too far. If, for instance, the Ministry, just as a Ministry in this country might do, should claim the right of including all their Votes in Supply in the Appropriation Bill, it was hard to say how far he, at that stage, could offer to such a proceeding an effective opposition. The whole question, he felt, was one of as great importance as could occupy their Lordships’ attention, in the interest of the colonies; but he should look upon the present discussion with much greater alarm and anxiety than he did, did he think the House was prepared to lend its countenance to the doctrine that the Government of this country was to control and meddle with the action of the Ministers of a colony, by stating what measures should and should not be presented by them to the consideration of the colonial Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I should not, my Lords, at this hour of the evening, venture to detain you, but that the doctrines you have just heard laid down by my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack seem to me to be dangerous in their character and likely to do injury wherever they are heard or read of. I do not, therefore, like to let the speech of my noble and learned Friend pass without entering my protest against the doctrine enunciated, although that protest comes from so young a Member of the House as myself. My noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack gave us a history of the crisis in the colony of Victoria, which, though strictly accurate, was, I think, somewhat too technical in its colour. I take the real state of the case to be shortly this. A Governor has been removed by the Secretary of State from his office because he had shown too great a partiality to one party, and an inclination to support one branch of the colonial Legislature against the other. No sooner was the Governor removed than the branch of the Legislature which he favoured proposed to award him a grant of money for having departed from the Imperial policy. If this is to be permitted, it is simply saying that this country must look calmly on while one of the branches of the colonial Legislatures encourages the Governor to disregard the spirit of the orders he had received from home, and that defiance of the Imperial rule by one portion of the colonial Legislature is not to receive any notice, censure, or resistance from the Home Government. Now, this is a policy which, divested of its technical aspect, your Lordships will not, I am sure, approve, and which cannot if followed out be otherwise than productive of danger to the Empire at large. I, for one, cannot concur in the estimate of a colonial Governor's position which my noble and learned Friend appears to have formed. He seems to regard a Governor of a colony as a mere mute personage; as a gentleman who is to have no will of his own, who is to represent nothing, and who is to do, with a certain amount of obsequiousness and servility, whatever the Ministers who happen to be seated in his council-chamber may bid him. Before, my Lords, you endorse such a doctrine as that, I would ask you to consider for a moment the consequences to which it is likely to lead. Do not, I pray you, be hurried away by the argument of my noble and learned Friend that, if you allow a Secretary of State to interfere as suggested before a Money Bill is introduced, you are thereby stifling discussion. The course which the Houses of Parliament in Victoria ought to have pursued if they wished to raise a question of this kind is perfectly clear. It is a course which is adopted every day in this country. They might simply have addressed the Crown expressing their views on the subject of the proposed appropriation of this money, and then the opinions of the Governor and of the Secretary of State, under whom the Governor acts, would in due form have been taken and expressed on the matter. I, however, understand my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack to lay down in the broadest and most distinct manner the doctrine that the Secretary of State was never to be permitted to interfere beforehand with any proposal which might be made by a Ministry in a colony where free constitutional government existed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I did not say so. I said that a Secretary of State who so interferes would run the risk of placing the Governor in such a position that he would be no longer able to retain the Ministry who advised him, and that the Ministry would refuse to act under his dictation.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I am sorry I misunderstood what fell from my noble and learned Friend; but I thought he censured very deeply any Secretary of State who should interfere in the way I have described. But, be that as it may, occasions may easily arise in which a Secretary of State may have before him only the alternative of interfering or allowing the honour of England to be tarnished. Let me suppose, for instance, that a colonial Ministry propose a Budget of repudiation. Will anybody contend that under such circumstances it would not be the duty of the Governor to put an absolute veto on the introduction of that Budget? I will not dilate on the results which might flow from that policy. In the case of our free colonies it might, perhaps, weaken the tie which subsists between them and the mother country; but, in the presence of such an argument, are we not entitled to ask what is the exact value of that tie? Might we not appreciate its value too highly? Would it not be better—a thousand times better—that the tie should be broken than that anything dishonouring to the Crown of England should be suffered? There is a large class with regard to which it might be the distinct duty of a Governor to impose a veto on the proposals of his constitutional advisers, and the duty of the Secretary of State to enforce the adoption of that course. But you may go further. The policy which a constitutional Ministry in a colony may recommend may, though not absolutely dishonourable to the Crown, be dangerous to Imperial interests all over the globe. They may recommend something which would be very embarrassing as regards the relations of the Crown to its colonies in every part of the world. This was partially so in the present case. If it be in the power of a colonial Assembly to buy off a Governor who represents the Crown, the power of the Crown is weakened throughout the entire extent of its dominions. It appears to me, therefore, a very dangerous doctrine to lay down that a Governor must not interfere with the action of his responsible advisers, and that the Secretary of State may not call a Governor to account for his conduct if he omits to do so at the proper time. I do not desire to enter more at present into the question which has been raised in this discussion. This is not an hour to do so; but I feel it is but a small portion of a very large subject which will more and more intrude itself upon your Lordship's attention. You will have more and more to consider how far the relation of England with those free constitutional colonies is a reality or a delusion. My noble and learned Friend says that free constitutional government would be a mockery and a delusion if the Secretary of State might interfere in the manner for which I contend and prevent discussion. But, my Lords, the connection between the Crown of England and its colonies will, in my opinion, be indeed a mockery and a delusion if his doctrine is allowed to prevail. Be the result what it may we must take care that whatever power we retain over them shall be a real power and that it shall be freely and honestly exercised for the good and the honour of the Empire. The moment circumstances arise in which it may appear to us that we can no longer exercise that power for those great ends the best and most honourable course for us to adopt is to resign it altogether.

EARL GREY said, that the noble Marquess who had just sat down (the Marquess of Salisbury) had so ably combated the doctrines laid down by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that it was needless for him to trouble their Lordships with some observations which he otherwise should have wished to address to them. At the same time the subject was of such grave importance that he might be permitted to add a few remarks to those just made by the noble Marquess, and in which he entirely concurred. He thought it absolutely necessary to the honour and interests of this country, if the connection between us and the colonies was to be continued, that we should maintain some degree of authority over them; and that authority could be exercised only through the Governor. On the other hand, the Governor could not be an effective instrument for exercising that authority unless his independence was preserved by a strict adherence to a rule laid down, not only within the last few years, but almost ever since we had had colonies. He believed that, as early as the time of Charles II., instructions to the same effect as were now given on that point were issued to our colonial Governors. Such Governors had certainly from an early period been prohibited from accepting any reward from the colonies. It had been argued that that prohibition applied to Governors only while in the service of the Crown; and that in regard to India, Parliament had passed an Act expressly forbidding our public servants to accept gifts from Native Princes, which Act did not operate elsewhere. It was perfectly true that the Act referred to did not apply to persons who had been in the colonial service of the Crown, and that the severer rule was confined to those who had served in India. But this by no means implied that Parliament had ever meant to sanction the making of grants to those who had been colonial Governors. It arose from the fact that legislation was necessary to restrain the practice in the one case and not in the other. If a Native Prince, not under the control of the British authorities, made a gift to a person who had held a public office in India, perhaps to reward him for some neglect of duty, there were no means to prevent so dangerous an abuse till it was made penal to accept such gifts. But in a colony no such case could arise, because the law invested the Crown with authority to prevent such a grant being made, by refusing its assent to any Act for making it. In another part of his speech the noble and learned Lord's argument, if admitted, would go to the length of making a colonial Governor a mere machine without the power of exercising any control whatever over his advisers or the Legislature. The noble and learned Lord said that the Governor could not have refused to allow a grant to be proposed, because if he had he would have been left without a Ministry. But if to avoid that inconvenience was to be regarded as a sufficient reason for permitting the grant to be proposed, it would equally be a reason for not afterwards withholding his assent from the Bill in which the grant was included. Indeed, it would be far more difficult for the Governor to interfere with the grant at the later than at the earlier stage of the proceedings; because when the Appropriation Act came up to him, that grant to the former Governor would be only a single item in it, and therefore the Governor would only have the option of either rejecting the whole of the Supplies of the year or of allowing the Vote to the ex-Governor to pass. And if he attempted to do that he would meet with precisely the same difficulty from his Ministers as if he had at first declined to authorize their recommending the grant. If he refused his assent to the Appropriation Bill his Ministry would resign; and therefore the coercion put upon the Governor would come at a different time, but even more certainly than by the other course. If the Governor in the present case had had plain and distinct instructions from the first from the Secretary of State, informing him that Her Majesty could not be advised to sanction such a proposal so contrary to the established rule there would have been no risk of that kind. His Ministers would have felt that if they resigned they would only throw their power into the hands of their political adversaries, and therefore an Instruction from home to the effect just indicated would have been an effectual protection against all the mischief that had arisen. It had been clearly shown that a great mistake had been committed in this case, and that owing to the want of proper firmness the colony of Victoria had been brought into a most unfortunate situation. Before sitting down he wished to say he thought it the duty of Her Majesty's Government to consider the position of extreme hardship in which the public servants of the colony were placed through the continued non-receipt of their salaries. One case in particular had been accidentally brought under his notice, in which a public servant who had faithfully served in the colony for ten years, under the promise of promotion and ultimately of a pension, was at present, owing to the failure of Supplies, left actually without the means of subsistence. That was only one instance out of many, for the entire body of public servants in the colony had long been deprived of their incomes, the public works had been stopped, and the whole affairs of the colony thrown into a state of deplorable confusion. It seemed to him it would be a useful function which the Home Government might exercise for the benefit of the colonists, when party spirit ran so high and produced such evils as now prevailed in Victoria, to step in as a moderating power and suggest some mode of accommodation that both parties could fairly accept. In this case there was a mode of accommodation which he thought might be proposed and accepted. He did not hesitate to express his opinion that under no circumstances ought Her Majesty's Government to admit the proposed grant to be given to Sir Charles Darling. He did not think it ought to be allowed that the recall of a Governor under such circumstances should be converted into a reward. At the same time he felt that the consequences of his recall fell with the greatest severity on Sir Charles Darling, who, after all, had committed an error of judgment only. Instead of giving that large grant to Lady Darling, he would suggest that the colonial Legislature might consent to settle on Sir Charles Darling the pension which under the Act giving pensions to colonial Governors he might have been entitled to if he had served a few years longer—the value of such a pension would be far less than the proposed grant, and would still leave the Governor under what would be a substantial punishment for the fault he had committed, while it would diminish its extreme severity. In that manner he might be greatly relieved from the severe consequences which had fallen upon him. There was another point that he wished to notice. People seemed to think that because in this country the refusal of the Supplies by the House of Commons necessarily compelled, sooner or later, the Government to give way, the same thing was the case in the colonies. Nothing could be more entirely erroneous. In their relations with the Imperial Government the colonial Legislatures stood in a different position from the House of Commons. He could speak from experience on that point. He knew that the refusal of the Supplies in a colony had not had the effect which was apprehended. The case of the colony of British Guiana illustrated and confirmed his assertion in that respect. In the case of Demerara where the colonial Legislature threatened to withhold a part of the accustomed grants in the hope of coercing the Home Government to a change in its commercial policy, instructions were sent out that the services for which grants were not voted should cease. Instructions were given to the Governor that if the grants necessary for maintaining the criminals in the prisons should be refused, they should be let out; that if the usual colonial allowances for the troops were not provided for, they were to be sent to Barbadoes, and that it must be for the colony to consider whether they would incur these consequences. The result was that the threat to refuse the Supplies proved to be an utter failure. If the noble Duke (the Colonial Secretary) had instructed the Governor in the present case not to include this grant in the Estimates, and if thereupon the Ministers had resigned and no others had been found, it would have been the colony that would have suffered. He had no doubt, however, that other Ministers would have been found. No one would say that if the colony refused to adopt the course pointed out by the Home Government any attempt to compel them by force should be resorted to; but the colony enjoyed, by virtue of the connection with the mother country, protection and support that were of the utmost value, but which were only to be given under certain conditions; and the colonists ought to understand that if those conditions were not fulfilled that support and protection would cease. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack argued that such a policy would destroy the ties between this country and colonies enjoying free institutions; but there was not the smallest ground for that assertion. The cases would not be numerous, and of course the power of the Crown should be exercised with discretion. In cases, however, where the honour of the Crown and of the Empire at large was concerned it was the duty of the Ministers of the Crown in this country to make it distinctly understood that they would firmly exercise the powers intrusted to the Crown by the Constitution, and then it would be for the colonies to decide. The moment he saw the alterations which the Victoria Legislature had not only been permitted but encouraged to make in the Constitutions established in that colony by the Act of 1850, he felt convinced that, sooner or later, there must come a collision between the two branches of the Legislature; for, while the one branch was made to consist of a limited number of members elected for life, the other was elected by the widest possible suffrage, and in the event of a difference of opinion arising between them, as was to be expected, no means were provided by the Constitution for extricating the colony from that difficulty. He could not but urge upon the colony to consider whether even now it would not be advisable to repeal or amend the Acts by which the Constitution, as settled by Parliament in 1850, had been so injudiciously altered. By the Act of 1850, by which the colony of Victoria was separated from New South Wales, a Constitution was given to it precisely the same with that which had for several years been in successful operation in New South Wales. Under this Constitution, the Legislature consisted of a single Chamber, two-thirds of the members being elected, and the others nominated for the duration of the Parliament by the Governor. To return to this system need not involve any abandonment of what is called responsible Government, on the contrary, it would, he thought, enable responsible Government to work much more satisfactorily and easily than it had done under the present system. Such was the equal division of parties in some of the colonies that there were changes of Ministry every two or three months, and sometimes oftener, and no one fixed or settled line of policy could be pursued. If the old form of Constitution were reverted to, and if a single Chamber were established, containing two-thirds of elected members and one-third nominated by the Crown, but really by the Minister of the day, the nominated Members would add weight to the scale and render Government more permanent. In his opinion these colonies had not the proper materials for constituting two different Chambers.

The Marquess of Salisbury

Earl Grey

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he desired to correct a misunderstanding as to what he had stated. He was very far from saying that circumstances might not arise of such transcendent importance as would justify the Home Government in issuing positive Instructions to the Governor of a colony as to the course which his Ministry should take. What he had said was that if the Ministry of a colony, supported by the full approbation of the Legislative Assembly and of the Home Government, recommended the introduction of a particular measure, and if the Home Government undertook to require the Governor to refuse his assent to the introduction of that measure, they would undertake the responsibility of bringing about that which was the natural consequence—a change of Ministry; and would thereby cause a deadlock in the colony in another form. With regard to the suggestion of the noble Earl (Earl Grey) that a pension should be voted by the colony to Sir Charles Darling, instead of the sum of £20,000 being given to Lady Darling, it would, no doubt, be looked upon with great favour in the colony, but it would accomplish the object they desired by an annual payment instead of a capital sum.

LORD KINGSTON quite agreed that some compensation should be provided for Sir Charles Darling; for no doubt he supposed that on resigning his office he would be entitled to compensation.

House adjourned at a quarter before
Nine o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, May 8, 1868.

MINUTES.]—SUPPLY—considered in Committee—Resolutions [May 7] reported.

WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—Exchequer Bonds (£600,000).

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Weights and Measures (Scotland)*; Jurors' Affirmations (Scotland)*.

First Reading—Customs and Income Tax* [108]; Weights and Measures (Scotland)* [109]; Jurors' Affirmations (Scotland)* [110].

Referred to Select Committee—Judgments Extension* [34].

Third Reading—Documentary Evidence* [97]; Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings [88], and passed.

POST OFFICE RETURNS—QUESTION.

MR. MOFFATT said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Why the Annual Report of the Postmaster General for 1866, presented to the House on the 12th August 1867, has not yet been delivered; and, when the Annual Report for 1867 may be expected?

MR. SCLATER-BOOOTH said, in reply, that he was unable to give an explanation of the reason why the printing of the documents had been so long delayed. As, however, the delay had taken place, it was thought that it would be more convenient to print and present the Returns for the last two years together. They would, probably, be laid on the table of the House in a fortnight or three weeks.

SCOTLAND—EDUCATION.—QUESTION.

ADMIRAL ERSKINE said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, If it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill on the subject of Education in Scotland during the present Session?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, in reply, that in consequence of the important and pressing matters which had occupied the attention of the House, and must continue so to do for some time to come, it was not the intention of the Government to proceed with the measure referred to by the hon. and gallant Member.

ARMY—BALL CARTRIDGE.—QUESTION.

MR. HAYTER said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, having regard to the increased danger to life from the use of Breech-loaders in the hands of Soldiers either insane or of intemperate habits, as evidenced by the recent occurrences at Horfield Barracks, near Bristol, he will undertake to advise with his Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief, as to the propriety of withdrawing the twenty rounds of Ball Cartridge now in the possession of all Non-commissioned Officers and Men of the British Army, and of serving out the same to the Troops on parade when about to proceed on military duty?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, in reply, that he had not had the opportunity of seeing the Commander-in-Chief upon the subject to which the hon. Member's Question related. Stating merely his individual opinion, he thought the occurrence of a single crime, however atrocious and much to be deplored, would not be cause sufficient for taking a step which would be felt as a slur by the whole Army, the ammunition having from time to time been confided to the care of soldiers.

UNITED STATES—THE "SPRINGBOK." QUESTION.

MR. BENTINCK said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers relating to the condemnation of the cargo of the British barque Springbok, by the Supreme Court of the United States, will be laid upon the Table? Portions of those Papers had been asked for four years ago.

LORD STANLEY, in reply, said, these Papers were now before the Law Officers of the Crown, but he believed a portion of them might shortly be produced. If his hon. Friend would explain privately which of them he wanted, no doubt he would be able to procure them.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ADMINISTRATION OF THE ARMY.

RESOLUTION.

MR. PERCY WYNNDHAM, in rising to move that, in the opinion of this House, it would be advantageous and convenient to substitute a system of weekly in lieu of daily payments to those non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers of the Army whose previous conduct might warrant the extension of this indulgence, said, he was of opinion that this indulgence would be of great benefit to soldiers of good conduct. The driblets of pay they received daily were of very little use to them, being so small after the regulation deduction. Raising the soldiers' pay had led to no less than 26,000 enlistments, and he believed the proposal he had in view would be attended by the most advantageous results, and would greatly encourage and facilitate the habit of saving. That proposal was a very simple one, and it had the great merit that it would not add one farthing to the Estimates. What he proposed was, that non-commissioned officers and soldiers should be paid weekly instead of daily. It was quite clear that they would prefer it, as even now they often got the captain to keep the money for them until the end of the week. The large number of men offering themselves for re-enlistment had enabled commanding officers to refuse men who had been guilty of misconduct, so that the men in the ranks were now of a class clearly entitled to favourable consideration. There had been instances before Delhi, and in Canada, and elsewhere, in which the ordinary rule of daily payments had been departed from, and the change had given great satisfaction to the men. There was recently a case in which, when some troops were sent to Malta, the officers of some of the regiments directed the arrears of ninety days' due—owing to the advance in the amount of soldiers' pay made last Session, on the recommendation of the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel)—to be paid in one payment, which amounted to 15s. or 20s. each man; and not only was this regarded as a boon, but the conduct of the troops who received it was such as fully to justify the confidence reposed in them by the officers; while, on the other hand, in other regiments at the same station, those arrears were paid in driblets; not only did the money do the soldiers very little good, but their conduct was not so praiseworthy as that of the men who received it in a lump sum. He also instanced the case of the payment of the men who were sent to Canada after the affair of the Trent, and stated that they much approved of the system of weekly payments. On these grounds, he hoped that the Government would give the question careful consideration.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it would be advantageous and convenient to substitute a system of weekly in lieu of daily payments to those non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers of the Army whose previous conduct might warrant the extension of this indulgence,"—(Mr. Percy Wyndham,)
—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, this was one of those matters affecting the internal economy of regiments in which he should not venture to interfere with the discretion of His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief. There was, no doubt, a good deal to be said in favour of the view advocated by his hon. Friend, and the matter, he promised, should not be lost sight of. Indeed, he believed, the Commander-in-Chief was about to make the alteration.

MR. PERCY WYNNDHAM said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Committee on the Scotch Reform Bill had been fixed for Monday; but he understood that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) had arranged that the Navy Estimates should be taken first on Monday; and the Scotch Reform Bill afterwards. Now, as he understood, the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall)—a Motion relating to the restrictions upon the importation of foreign cattle —which has been delayed many times, and in which great interest is felt—will be taken before Supply, and he did not think they could reckon on getting through that discussion in less than two hours. Then he felt that the Navy Estimates would carry the right hon. Gentleman far through the night. Now, he should be glad if, for the convenience of the House, they could understand what arrangement the right hon. Gentleman proposed?

MR. DISRAELI said, he was aware of the circumstances to which the right hon. Gentleman had called attention, and he had been consulting with one of his right hon. Friends on the subject at the moment when the right hon. Gentleman rose. He did not think it would be satisfactory either that the House should be in any doubt about the time at which the Scotch Reform Bill would come on or that the Bill should be brought forward at a late hour. He thought, therefore, it was better to have it understood that the Bill would not be taken on Monday. The Boundary Bill was the first Order for Thursday night. He would put the Scotch Reform Bill down as the second; and if it could not be brought on that night it might be fixed for another day.

MR. CRAUFURD said, that his conviction was that the discussion on the Boundary Bill would occupy so much time as to throw the Scotch Reform Bill over. He therefore hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would fix the Scotch Reform Bill as the first Order. So important a Bill should not be placed second.

MR. DISRAELI suggested that they had better confine themselves at present to arranging that the Bill was not to come on next Monday. On Monday they could make further arrangements.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

SIR J. CLARKE JERVOISE said, that in rising to move for an Address to the Queen praying for an inquiry into the spread of disease by infection, with a view to legislation on the subject, he made no pretence to science beyond that knowledge which was founded upon facts. His only logic in connection with this matter was the inexorable logic of facts. This question he (Sir J. Clarke Jervoise) considered to be one of unbounded magnitude, and of the greatest possible interest. When he brought forward the measure last year he was answered by the noble Lord the Vice President of the Committee of Council, who said that all infectious disorders were contagious, but all contagious disorders were not infectious, and stated also that a few Gentlemen connected with the Privy Council were acquainted with all disorders. It had been stated by the Medical Officers of the Privy Council that every disorder was descended in regular pedigree, and that, though we could no more tell the first parent of disease than we could tell the origin of species, the consequence might be predicted with the certainty of a chemical experiment. He confessed, however, his inability to perceive how, according to the rules of logic, it was possible to argue with the certainty of a chemical experiment upon premises which were altogether uncertain. The Pall Mall Gazette had spoken of his Notice as one that perplexed the student of the Notice Paper of the House of Commons. He did not, however, think that the services of any literary Brothers Davenport were required to unravel the meaning. But if he was altogether incomprehensible there would be nothing singular in that. Last year, on speaking to an eminent Member of that House who had taken a leading part in connection with the Cattle Plague Bill, that Gentleman observed to him that he knew nothing at all about the matter. "What!" was his exclamation, "and you a Member of the Government which brought in the Bill! have you been legislating on what you do not understand?" The reply was, "Certainly; if we only legislated on what we understand there would be no legislation at all." He was convinced that an inquiry into the subject would result in great good to all ranks of the community from the highest to the lowest. Last year he mentioned that leprosy was a type of all that had been said of the dangers and communicability of disease by the process of infection; and he wished now to point out that the mode of dealing with leprosy was the type of many of the mistakes, follies, and crimes which had been perpetrated in the name of humanity. There were still remains existing of the leper-houses which once were so numerous in this land. The disease still prevailed in India and in Syria, and since last year there had been a remarkable case at Alexandria, where Dr. Simonides died in the autumn of leprosy. Thus, we had the disease descending from the original parent of leprosy, and showing itself in the deascendant of the original Simon. Referring to smallpox, he mentioned the case at Aylesbury of Emanuel Cooke, who twice escaped from the workhouse, was taken before the magistrates, and sentenced to fine or imprisonment. It was also said that one of the Royal Family had suffered from smallpox; and we could only hope that Royal princes were at least properly vaccinated. It was further reported that the Secretary of State for War had suffered from something of the kind. One statement said it was chickenpox, and another said it was something else. He understood on good authority it was smallpox. What with chicken, and cowpox, it only required a little change in age and sex to make a cock-and-bull story; and he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman was not present to give the House some information on the matter. At all events, we must hope he was not exposed to the isolation inflicted on the pauper at Aylesbury, and that he was not denied the consolation of his friends. The Compulsory Vaccination Bill he had opposed, because it was not fair to subject poor people to the trouble it would entail upon them. It was cruel to ask a poor woman in the country to travel four miles, perhaps, in the depth of winter or height of summer for the purpose of getting her child vaccinated, merely upon the supposition that the disease might be communicated, which had not been proved in a single instance. There was a town (Sheffield) where a meeting of the inhabitants was held in consequence of the surgeon to the troops who were quartered there having made a report that some of the soldiers in the barracks were attacked with smallpox, and that there were numerous cases in the town. But this latter statement must have arisen from a mere guess on the part of the surgeon; that because there was smallpox in the barracks therefore it must be in the town; for when an inquiry was made hardly a single case could be found in the town; and on going back to the barracks the cause of the disease was traced plainly enough to the defective state of the arrangements there, and on removing these the disease disappeared. When the noble Lord stated last year that smallpox was absolutely preventible by vaccination, he must have known that, according to the Report of the Small pox Hospital, in round numbers, 81 per cent of the cases which entered that hospital were vaccinated cases. It might be that the majority of deaths occurred amongst those who had not been vaccinated—probably they could not read or write; but the fact he had stated showed that vaccination did not prevent a recurrence of the disease. With respect to typhus fever it was known that it was produced in many cases by foul water, by defective drainage, and by other kindred causes, which led to blood-poisoning. Several recent cases of gaol fever occurred at Devizes—where the Judge ordered the windows of the Court to be opened, and the jury sat with their hats on for fear of infection. Had the Judge never heard of John Howard, nor ever seen a Sister of Charity going forth on her mission of mercy?—he would also refer to outbreaks of typhus fever at the village of Terling, in Essex. That outbreak was self-originating, but was said to be due to the defective state of the water supply of the village. With regard to quarantine, he had a memorial signed by many gentlemen, none of whom probably would support him in all his views, who nevertheless saw the absurdity and cruelty of quarantine. A large amount of evidence had been obtained in reference to the cattle plague, and that evidence was not worthy of consideration as to the origin of the disease. The present laws on the subject of infectious diseases were crude and cruel. How was it possible to put such laws in force? Called on as a magistrate to enforce them, he had felt that there is a time when duty ceases and conscience begins; and he had declined any longer to act in administering these laws.

MR. LIDDELL, in seconding the Motion, said he was in hopes that even in the midst of political excitement the importance—he might almost say the necessity—of this subject would induce the House to give it a very careful attention. His great object was to prevail on the hon. Baronet and the House to allow the scope of this inquiry to be extended to a point beyond that contemplated by the hon. Baronet. He wished to extend the inquiry to a class of diseases unfortunately too prevalent, and to see whether the provisions of the Contagious Diseases Act might not be applied to all the great towns of the kingdom. Many Members of the House were aware that there existed an important central association in London, whose object was to have that Act extended to the civil population of our towns, and, further, very many great towns in the country were prepared to ask for the boon. Within the last few days, the great town of Newcastle, with which he was connected, had held a very important meeting upon the subject, and was prepared to ask the House to extend the Act to them, and he desired to add his voice to theirs. The difficulty that was felt in debating this subject was that one was precluded from bringing forward in public discussion the facts and evidence necessary to prove the case; but those facts and that evidence would be forthcoming at the right time and in the right place if the inquiry were extended as suggested. In many of the great towns, as he had said, a remarkable unanimity of opinion had existed on this question, and their case rested, not upon panic or excitement, but upon the sober observation of medical men. The evil was a social evil in the truest sense, because even the sanctity of home was stealthily broken in upon by this intruder, and thousands of children were swept away, or permanently affected by its ravages annually, and the seeds of divers diseases were thus sown broadcast among the population. In order to effect the purpose he had in view it would only be necessary to exclude from the Motion of the hon. Baronet the words "distinguished from contagion," so that both infectious and contagious disorders might be made the subject of the Inquiry. The hon. Baronet had designated the Compulsory Vaccination Act a cruel law; but that epithet certainly did not apply to the Contagious Diseases Act. The military and naval authorities could bear testimony to the fact that the Contagious Diseases Act had been attended with considerable benefit to those places in which it had been in operation; the unfortunate victims of these maladies hailed the medical surveillance as a boon, and that Act might now, he thought, be extended to the large centres of our population with such an amount of advantage to the public welfare as it was difficult to estimate. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in dealing with great social and sanitary questions, was not a man to be appalled by difficulties, and he appealed to him to grant the Inquiry now asked for.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to cause such inquiry to be instituted into the spread of disease by infection (distinguished from contagion) as may tend to check legislation and action in cases unsupported by the evidence, which in times of excitement saves a people from the commission of great crimes or great follies,"—(Sir Jervoise Clarke Jervoise,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU stated that the object of the hon. Baronet was already being carried out by the Medical Department of the Privy Council. The spread and the origin of disease was the subject of scientific study year by year, and of prolonged and accurate investigation. Annually there is laid before Parliament every new experience which is gained by that Office, or which is arrived at throughout the country, or even abroad. As examples he might mention the sixth Report of the year 1864, which gave the result of an interesting inquiry on the spread of communicable diseases in hospitals; the Report of 1866 dealt with the practice of quarantine, and showed it was of very little use as a preventive of yellow fever, although it might be required for commercial reasons. If we did not impose it here on some ships, all our ships would be put in quarantine abroad. The medical officers also made special experimental researches; in 1867 a minute investigation touching the communicability of cholera was made, and anyone who had read that Report would see that no pains or expense had been spared to make the inquiry exhaustive. This year a special investigation was being made regarding the communicability of phthisis and the allied diseases by means of inoculation. The hon. Baronet had complained that the Pall Mall Gazette had spoken of his Motion as unintelligible; he would, perhaps, pardon him if he were obliged to agree with the Pall Mall Gazette. He had been greatly perplexed as to the meaning of the Motion, and had chanced to fall into the same error as the hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Liddell). The terms of the Motion suggested another kind of infection, and a mode of infection which was common in large towns, and especially in our chief military stations; the terms of the Motion were these—

"The spread of disease by infection (distinguished from contagion) as may tend to check legislation and action in cases unsupported by the evidence, which in times of excitement saves a people from the commission of great crimes or great follies."

He, therefore, had come down to the House under the impression that the hon. Baronet intended to refer to the Contagious Diseases Act; the Secretary for War had been under the same impression, and only a few minutes ago had discovered that he (the Secretary for War) might be released from the trouble of reply, and that he (Lord Robert Montagu) was to be the victim of the hon. Baronet's speech. It appeared now, however, that the hon. Baronet desired a Royal Commission to inquire into subjects at present dealt with by the Medical Officer of the Privy Council. If he desired the Commission to travel over the same ground as the medical officers, it would obviously be unnecessary; if he desired it to extend its operations beyond the scope assigned to that officer, he would be simply asking the House to re-constitute the Medical Department of the Board of Health, which Parliament had abolished in 1858. In either case the inquiry he asked for would be conducted under less rigid control than that which ruled the Medical Department of the Privy Council, and would involve a far larger expense than that which was now voted; and for these reasons he recommended the withdrawal of the Motion.

MR. BRUCE said, he believed the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. Liddell) was mistaken as to the object of the hon. Baronet's Motion. As he understood the case, the hon. Baronet wished for an inquiry into the subject of infection, seeming to be under the impression that infection was different from contagion. In this view of the case, the addendum of the hon. Member was not applicable; but he noticed that the hon. Baronet approved the proceedings of a wrong-headed man, at Sheffield, whose sole object in life seemed to be to incite people to resist the beneficent law of vaccination. He (Mr. Bruce) therefore desired to say a word to correct the harm which might result from the observations of the right hon. Baronet. During the last few days a Return had been made as to the results of the Vaccination Act in Ireland since 1864, when compulsory vaccination was first enforced. The Commission stated in that Report that the smallpox returns from workhouse fever hospitals in 1867 showed 4 deaths as compared with 149 in 1864, or 1-37th. The returns of smallpox medical officers of dispensaries showed that only 24 cases had been treated in the half-year ending September, 1867, while 850 cases had been treated in the corresponding half-year of 1864. It also appeared that, out of 153 Unions in Ireland, there were only 4 in which smallpox existed at the time the Report was made. Then the Return showed that in 1864 the deaths from smallpox were 853; in 1865, the number was reduced to 347; in 1866, it was reduced to 187; and in 1867 only 20 died. Considering what an amount of misery had, as this Return showed, been prevented by the Vaccination Act during these few years in only one portion of the kingdom, he could not permit derision of vaccination by a Member of the House of Commons to pass without rebuke. He agreed with the hon. Member for Northumberland on the question he had raised—he thought the Contagious Diseases Act might be beneficially extended to the large towns—but he recommended the hon. Member to bring forward a special Motion on the subject.

Lord Robert Montagu

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. CLIVE said, he rose to call attention to the Seventeenth General Report on Turnpike Trusts made by direction of the Secretary of State for the Home Department under the Act 3 & 4 Will. IV., c. 80. In 1864, he had the honour of being Chairman of a Committee on the subject, of which the Under Secretary for the Home Department (Sir James Ferguson) was a member; so that, whenever during the past year or two he had been asked by his Friends what progress had been made in the matter, or rather, why no progress at all had been made, he answered that there was a Gentleman at the head of that Department of Home Affairs who was thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and would, no doubt, do it justice. He had believed there was every reason to hope for favourable results from the present Administration. But what had occurred? Under the former Administration, 120 or 130 Turnpike Trusts were scheduled for abolition; but since the accession to Office of the present Government—and especially under the Administration of the noble Lord, now a Governor in Australia (the Earl of Belmore)—a retrograde course had been pursued, and the policy adopted for many years past with regard to turnpikes had been exactly reversed. In the first paragraph of the Report, credit was taken for a great improvement in the work in connection with this subject in the Home Office. He objected that a reflection should be thrown upon the administration of the Home Office in former years; and contended that no credit whatever was due to the present administration, notwithstanding the claim which had been put forward. The official Report, contrary to all precedent, was taken up with two or three pages of the old stock trumpery arguments, which had been answered again and again in favour of the continuance of turnpikes; and the statement, moreover, was entirely ex parte. It certainly was disheartening to find that, after so many years' effort to get rid of the evils of the turnpike system, renewed impediments should be thrown by the action of the Government, or by the influence of their supporters, in the way of useful legislation.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, in seconding the Motion, said, that all that the Home Office could do was to press the clerks to produce the returns as soon as possible. He concurred in the complaint made by his hon. Friend (Mr. Clive), and must further complain that the action of the Home Office had led to the introduction, for the first time, of arguments into the annual statement with reference to trusts. He was aware that the Act of Parliament stated that observations might be made in the Report; but the Legislature never intended that it should contain a series of arguments which would enable persons who took a peculiar view to quote an official document in support of it, and to assert that it was the judgment of the Home Office. During the few months that he had filled the Office of Under Secretary for the Home Department, he had never ventured to embody in an official statement of this nature his own views on the subject of turnpike tolls. This was a question of the very greatest importance, and he should like, if the opportunity were afforded, to have a further discussion upon it. When he saw the contents of this annual statement he was inclined to answer it, but refrained from doing so because he thought that course would be inconvenient to the House. He could not enter into the question as it stood now without raising the whole turnpike question; but, when the Turnpike

Bill, of which he had charge, came before the House, he should be glad to discuss the whole subject, and to expose the weakness and fallacy of the statements which had been made. The present Government had reversed the process which had been acted upon for years with regard to turnpike trusts, deliberately setting aside the Report of the Select Committee. He perceived in the Report statements which he ventured to think he had answered successfully two or three years ago. He hoped they had not been introduced for the purpose of creating a precedent; but he thought that they ought not to have been introduced in their present shape, even with the object of elucidation. He believed the present state of the law to be unequal, uncertain, and most unsatisfactory; and, therefore, if the Government undertook to bring in a Bill to effect the desired reform, he should be very glad to give them his assistance.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of all the Communications received in reply to the Circular sent in February 1866 to certain Turnpike Trustees referred to in p. 9 of the Seventeenth Report on Turnpike Trusts, of which Extracts are therein given, together with the names of the Correspondents,"—(Mr. Clive,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

LORD HENLEY said, that the subject was one of great importance. The Report confirmed an idea which he had formed, after what he had heard in Committees on the turnpike system—namely, that the Home Office was not the tribunal by which matters relating to turnpike trusts could be decided in a satisfactory manner. There were as many as 1,033 of those trusts, and it could not be supposed that either the Secretary of State for the Home Department or his Under Secretary had time to attend to them. Besides, they required local knowledge which one could not expect to find in the Home Office. There were 194 trusts out of debt, but with these the Home Office had not dealt very satisfactorily. As for the reasons assigned in the Report for not throwing the roads on the parishes when the trusts had expired, they might be summed up in the allegation that such a course would increase the rates. Why, of course it would; but he had supposed that the great desideratum was to have the roads maintained by the parishes. That had been done in some districts of the metropolis where the expense of maintaining the roads was something like £2,000 a year per mile. When, in 1863, the suburban parishes, such as Fulham and Hammersmith, objected to the Act throwing open about seventy miles of roads in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, on the plea that the wear and tear of those highways were caused by the metropolitan traffic, the answer was that the valuation of those parishes had been enormously increased in consequence of their proximity to the metropolis. In Hammersmith the rateable value of the property in the parish had been increased from £30,000 to £150,000 in about thirty years, and the same argument could be applied to almost every turnpike road in the country which ran through an agricultural district. All parishes through which a high road passed, were to some extent benefited by it. There were 834 trusts still in debt, and in respect of these also the action of the Home Office had not been satisfactory. He threw out these suggestions in the hope that, in any legislation on the subject which might be in contemplation, some of the difficulties might be removed.

Mr. GOLDNEY said, the Report showed that there were in round numbers about 1,000 turnpike trusts, of which 800 were in debt, and 200 out of debt. The lettable amount of the tolls was in 1866 about £950,000, and the expense of collection and toll-rents' profits amounted at the lowest computation to about £300,000 more, bringing the total amount which the public contributed up to about £1,250,000. The whole sum expended for the repair of the roads only amounted to about £500,000 however, and in reduction of that the parishes contributed about £50,000. Now, if the repair of the roads throughout England were thrown on the parishes, those parishes would be relieved to a very large extent from the maintenance of many of the parallel roads in existence, or would only have to repair them to an extent sufficient for the agricultural purposes of the various districts. He had been able to prove to farmers who objected to having the maintenance of the roads thrown upon the rates, that if that course were adopted they would pay considerably less in the shape of rates for the repair of the roads than they had to pay now for tolls in going to markets and railway stations. The public were mulcted of £1,500,000 annually, for which they were only benefited in return to the amount of about two-fifths, the rest going in one way or another towards expenses and machinery. The county of Essex had got rid of all its turnpikes and was now experiencing the benefit of the step it had taken. Surely that was good evidence in favour of the abolition of turnpikes. The Report now before the House ventilated the whole subject thoroughly, and he was glad to hear that the Government intended to bring in a Bill upon the subject.

Mr. WHALLEY said, he thought the Report went in a retrograde direction, and entirely upset all that had been done before. The Home Office had in a most extraordinary way taken the part of the country against the cities, and had actually gone out of its way to show reasons why the law should be—he might almost say—violated. They had gone as far back as the year 1836. All the tolls throughout the country were levied under certain Acts of Parliament. The power to levy was originally a contract, ratified by Parliament, between the trustees and the public, and was always limited to a certain number of years. Every year, therefore, a Turnpike Trust Continuance Bill was brought in, usually at the end of July to continue these contracts and the power of levying tolls. The public in the districts concerned were never consulted with regard to the Bill; there was no possibility of discussing the question, and Parliament was really acting entirely in opposition to the interests of the public in this matter. He would observe that those persons who lent their money on these trusts knew that the investment was in the nature of a terminable annuity, and consequently in the matter of their renewal they had the barest equity. If the turnpikes were to become an institution, under the Home Office, why was the Continuance Act brought in every year? The proper course would be to make the Act permanent. It was a mistake to suppose that this question was one in which no interest was felt. The state of the roads had occasioned riots in Wales, and Sir George Lewis had said the only way the people could remedy the grievance was by taking the law into their own hands. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would be good enough to listen to the earnest appeals that were made to him to pay attention to this matter, which, as time advanced, affected the interests of the country more and more.

LORD GEORGE CAVENDISH, while admitting that nothing in a small way was more vexatious than to be stopped on the road to pay a toll, said, that the toll system at least secured good roads, which were paid for by those who used them. If the repair of all roads was thrown on the parishes, a much more vexatious state of things would exist—the roads would be allowed to go out of repair. You might force the repair of the road upon the unwilling ratepayers, but they would prove like the horse at the water that could not be made to drink. Farmers would repair the roads to be traversed by their own carts, but would leave them in an unsatisfactory condition for other conveyances. Had we possessed all our present experience we might have devised a better system as regards our legislation on turnpike trusts. Certain districts might have been grouped together, and, as the terms fell out, the trusts might have been continued from year to year until all the roads in that district could have been brought under the Home Office together. If that had been done, greater economy could have been practised, many toll-bars might have been removed, and, finally, one term could have been fixed for all the roads in the district. As it was, great injustice often arose; because an Act was allowed to expire a road was thrown upon the highway rates, perhaps a parallel road was repaired by tolls, and the result was the traffic was diverted to the road which had been freed from toll-bars. This might have been avoided under a more uniform system, which would have allowed those who took an interest in the matter to put the roads of a large district under one management. The gradual abolition of tolls under such a system would have led farmers to look upon highway districts with greater satisfaction. In speaking of the debt, he wished to refer to the system which prevailed in Scotland, and which worked admirably. The system of rating was different, for the landlords assumed the payment of the debt; but, although the English system was different, the solution of the difficulty would be facilitated if the landowners would take one-half the debt on themselves, and the other half were paid by the occupiers. One source of difficulty in dealing with the debt was the apathy of creditors about their capital when it was once lodged in the hands of a trust. That might be natural when 5 per cent interest was paid, but the extraordinary thing was that it should be so in the case of trusts paying  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. He had known cases where persons who were only receiving  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and not always that, upon the worst security in the world, had neglected to accept offers to pay them off at £50, and even at £60. In one case he had got on behalf of a charity a composition of £47 for such a debt, which was at the rate of more than thirty years' purchase, where the Act would expire in five years. This apathy accounted for the large debt still remaining on the trusts; but when Government took action, and proposed to do away with the trusts, these same people would object that their property was being confiscated, though they had neglected their chance of obtaining composition for their money invested in the roads. He thought that the only settlement of the question which could prove satisfactory would be to throw the cost of the roads on large districts rather than upon parishes. It was understood that a measure was to be brought forward by the Home Secretary, who would perhaps give some explanation of it, but without knowing what the Government would do the House could hardly come to a practical conclusion.

MR. SCOURFIELD agreed that the farmer who used the roads would not have to pay more if the roads were maintained out of the rates; but the grievance would be that those who did not use them would have to pay the same as those who did.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was very sorry so much fault had been found with a Report published under his auspices; but many of the objections taken to it were not, in his opinion, valid. It was said that credit was taken for something now carried out by the present Government. It was not, however, this, but the last Government that had the credit—if credit were to be taken at all—for something that had been done by Mr. William Harrison. From the speeches made it might be supposed that the task of settling the turnpike affairs of the country was an easy one; but he was bound to say that, having had his attention drawn, during the last two months, to the subject, he had come to the conclusion that the difficulties in the way appeared greater the nearer they were approached. In consequence of the strong feeling generally existing against any increase in the rating, the present time was the very worst for dealing with the question; and therefore, if an attempt were made now to throw the roads upon the rates, he believed the outcry would be great indeed, and in many instances it would be just. It was true, according to the Report, that the tolls levied amounted to £945,458, and that the cost of repairs was only 58 per cent of the receipts. But 30 per cent was paid for interest upon debt, making 80 or 90 per cent, and law charges and salaries bring up the amount to about the 100. Beyond this there were the expenses and profits of the toll collectors, and thus a greater cost was imposed on the country than was estimated by the sum of £945,000. He could not say how much this would be. But he thought that before any steps were taken to deal with the subject of turnpike trusts there should be a valuation taken of debts at the present time with a view to ascertain what they were really worth; because, at the rates mentioned by the noble Lord (Lord George Cavendish) they would not prove so formidable in fact as they looked on paper. It would be desirable to know what they were really worth in the market; and he believed that the creditors of the roads would be glad to take such a valuation if it were fairly made. The next question that arose was, how the roads, when freed from debt, were to be dealt with—whether by county Boards, or by highway districts. He confessed his present impression was that highway districts would give insufficient areas for the purpose. Again, when you were dealing with these turnpike roads, which were not now all main roads, power must be given to any authority set up to declare which should be main roads, and in the case of turnpike roads which were now only common highways, to let them fall into comparative disrepair. He did not say that they should be allowed to fall into absolute disrepair; but all these roads need not absolutely be kept up on the same footing. It would be necessary, also, to enter into many other points. A difference existed in the penal laws affecting turnpike roads and main roads. To take a small instance. By the Turnpike Acts a person was not allowed to place manure within thirty feet of the middle of the road; in the case of a highway, the distance allowed was fifteen feet. A case had occurred in which the moment a road was thrown upon the parish manure had been deposited within fifteen feet of it. It would be necessary, therefore, if they proceeded to deal with the question, to consider all the laws relating to the two classes of roads. Great fault had been found with a part of this Report which contained certain reasons; but he thought it was well that the House should have before them a narrative of what occurred in 1866. In giving this narrative his object was not to offer an argument on the part of the Home Office, but to show the nature of the trusts in different parishes. His hon. Friend had included in the Turnpike Trusts Continuance Bill a great number of trusts that were meant to expire. At one time he had thought of inserting in the Continuance Bill all the trusts which were out of debt, and referring the Bill to a Select Committee. He should have done that this Session, but hon. Members whom he would have liked to place upon the Committee expressed a disinclination to undertake so great a task. He proposed, however, to introduce a Continuance Bill at an earlier period than usual—as soon as he could get it ready; and he should have no objection, in cases which seemed to the House to require investigation, to refer them, or any part of them, to a Select Committee. With respect to bringing in a Bill himself, he had had a Bill prepared, but having only just received it from the draftsman, he had not yet had time to examine it; and he should not bring it in unless it was one which met with his entire approval, and unless it was in a shape which satisfied him that it had a chance of passing. His desire was that the thing should be thoroughly understood; but the circumstances of the Session forbade a general inquiry. It was not desirable to discuss the question further on a Motion of this description. He agreed that turnpikes and turnpike tolls were disagreeable things; and on this point he spoke feelingly, because in no part was the toll system more vexatious than in that in which he resided. Up to last year there were three turnpikes between his house and the railway station, and there were now two. As far as he was concerned, therefore, he should be glad to get rid of turnpikes. At the same time, it was only fair to consider who was to bear the burden when tolls were abolished. His own notion was that you could not arrive at a satisfactory conclusion on this point without the creation of county Boards, giving them power, as he understood was the case in Scotland, to take tolls at such points as they thought proper.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

MR. NEATE said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not overlook the case of those roads where the tolls had been abolished; for redress was called for with respect to them as much as it was called for with respect to those where tolls still existed. A flagrant injustice had been done under the substituted system of rating. There were instances in which those roads were made without any reference to the parish in which they were made, and which was rated for their maintenance. He knew an instance in which a road had been made just outside a gentleman's park, and not with any unjust idea, for, in the first instance, the road had been kept up by tolls; but the abolition of those tolls had thrown the burden upon an adjoining parish.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HARDCASTLE, who had given Notice of a Motion that the position of Turnpike Trusts now expired but annually renewed should be submitted to the consideration of a Select Committee, said he should not press it, but hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would appoint a Select Committee to consider the expired Turnpike Trusts Acts which might be brought under his notice; and he trusted that it would not be long before the Continuance Act was introduced.

ARMY—FORTIFICATIONS—DOCKYARDS AND NAVAL ARSENALS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the plans upon which the Fortifications for the defence of the Dockyards and Naval Arsenals of the United Kingdom, and for the defence of our Colonies, were being constructed. He wished to state at the outset that he brought forward this question in no party spirit, but purely in a national point of view. For much of the information which he had obtained on the subject he was indebted to articles which had appeared in the organ of the right hon. Gentleman opposite—the Standard newspaper—and he had satisfied himself that the information thus obtained was in every instance strictly correct. In 1860 Lord Palmerston startled the House by proposing a Vote of £9,000,000 for fortifications for the defence of our naval arsenals. Upon that occasion a debate of a most interesting character took place, in which the hon. Members for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) and others who had ever been foremost as the careful custodians of the public purse, opposed the Vote; but the influence of the Government was too much for them, and after a protracted debate, extending over two or three nights, and after many Amendments and divisions, the Resolution was carried—Lord Palmerston promising that the Government in power should come to Parliament every year for a Vote for the sum required of that year, and present an Appropriation Act for that purpose. On the 9th of August, 1860, when the second reading of the first Appropriation Bill was proposed, Mr. Edwin James, who was then a Member of the House, moved a very remarkable Amendment, to the effect that, before proceeding further with the Bill, it was desirable that the House should be in the possession of more certain information as to the entire cost of the constructions and the efficient maintenance of the proposed sea and land fortifications, distinguishing the expense of each. That Amendment was seconded by Sir Charles Napier, but it shared the fate of its predecessors. The Minister of the day had his way upon the subject, and the Government went on with the construction of the forts on their own plans, as if the question was not open to debate. It would almost seem reasonable that, before an expenditure of between £5,000,000 and £6,000,000 was entered upon, some degree of caution and inquiry with reference to these fortifications should have marked the movements of those in authority; but the House would be surprised when he stated that little or no inquiry took place, as would be seen, when he explained to them the experiments that took place, and the result. They were in no better position now with reference to the construction of these forts than they were in 1860. At that time, as well as at this moment, the following questions among others were entirely open—whether the land forts should be constructed of granite only, or granite in connection with iron shields—whether they were to be faced with iron upon granite, or whether granite was first to be built up, and iron in the shape of fortresses erected upon it; and then what was to be the thickness of the iron, and whether it should be solid or laminated? all of them most serious questions, and each one involving the success or failure of the undertaking. The construction of the first fortification proceeded, and a few experiments were attempted. The first, which took place the year before the Vote to which he had referred, was with reference to a combination of iron and stone. The experiment was made with the 40, 70, and 68-pounders of that day, at 400 yards range, and the result was that the stone was smashed to atoms, whilst the iron remained uninjured; and on the following day, the stone being cut away, the iron stood the test of the same guns, even in salvoes. That was the state of their information in 1860. In that year other experiments were tried. Mr. Hawkshaw, the celebrated engineer, who had been a few days since named a member of the new Commission by the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington), produced a target on the laminated principle, but that was easily penetrated by two shots from a seven-inch Armstrong breech-loader, the second shot, in fact, going clean through it. In 1863 Colonel Inglis produced a laminated target which proved a partial success, and Captain Noble and General Lefroy reported that a six-inch laminated target was not so strong as a four-inch solid iron one. In 1864 and 1865 one or two very remarkable experiments took place—the first experiment in which the shield principle was fairly tested. Two sets of casemates were constructed at Shoeburyness. One had a shield 12 feet by 8 feet and 4 inches thick fixed in front of it. The result was a total failure, and that settled the combination principle of stone and iron, the Report of the Ordnance Select Committee was unfavourable to the stability of casemates so constructed, which they stated were unable to withstand six consecutive shots from the same gun. The Defence Committee also distinctly stated in their Report that granite forts were untenable, and Colonel Inglis had expressed a similar opinion upon one occasion. A 68-pound cast iron shot fired at a granite block shattered it into a thousand pieces, and a more complete demolition could hardly be effected. Those experiments he thought would be sufficient to prove all that he desired to impress upon the House, that this momentous question was far from being settled, and that they had not yet got on the right road with reference to the construction of fortifications; he asked the House whether they would persist, or permit the Government to persist, in the construction of these forts until they had arrived at some certain data from which they could safely start? He had no desire to embarrass the Executive in any way; his only object in bringing the subject forward was the interest of the public, in order that the construction of these fortifications might be discontinued until something more was known about the subject, and that by the suspension of the works a waste of public money might be prevented. In the early part of last year Colonel Jervis presented a Report upon the various fortifications which were then in course of erection, in which Report he minutely described them, distinguishing those of stone and mortar, and of earthworks, and those at Portsmouth and on the Plymouth Breakwater. It was not his intention to go through that Report, but he would simply mention the result. The greater number of forts in which granite was used were described as being constructed for the purpose of receiving at their embrasures iron shields, and from that Report the consideration of the iron shield principle might be said to have originated. But it was with reference to the third class, which was the most important—namely, the Plymouth Breakwater forts and the Portsmouth forts, that he desired the attention of the House a few moments. He believed the only fort for which contracts had been completely entered into was that for the Plymouth Breakwater. It was no doubt a structure of great importance. Colonel Jervis had carefully described the principle upon which it was to be built, but he (Mr. O'Beirne) would point out what he considered the fault of its construction, and the necessity for further inquiry. It would be a very costly structure; it was to be built of stone and mortar, of considerable thickness, to the height of 18 feet above high water mark; and upon that structure an iron fortification was to be erected, for which a contract was entered into in the early part of last year. This fort was to be of iron, and would cost £40,000. It was to be placed on a building of stone and mortar, offering to the enemy's guns an assailable surface of 18 feet below the iron wall, which could not, under any circumstances, be protected by the water. Now, if the experiments he had quoted were good for anything they showed that stone and mortar were not materials on which a fort could be safely built if any part of that stone and mortar was exposed to an enemy's fire; that a very few shots from an ordinary sized gun would destroy it and thus send the iron structure which was placed upon it about the men's ears. That opinion was also entertained by experienced engineers, iron-masters, and military men who had given the subject their attention. Stone and mortar, it had been clearly shown, were useless with regard to strength and resisting power. What reliance, therefore, could the House or the country place upon those who had adopted for the erection of one of the most important and one of the most expensive of the intended works, a principle which even the little knowledge we possessed had declared to be worthless. Last year, when the Provision for Expenses Bill, to authorize the expenditure of £800,000 for forts, during the year 1867-8, was in Committee, he (Mr. O'Beirne) moved a Resolution, which he was very anxious at the time to have carried, that all further expenditure on the forts should be stopped until a Committee of the House should have an opportunity of considering and reporting upon the whole subject; but his proposal was modified upon the promise of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for War that such experiments as they wished should be carried out. [SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Hear, hear!] The experiments were to be, as he understood, of two characters—first, with reference to shields; and secondly, with reference to forts. But when the Bill came up for a third reading the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) declined to give any undertaking that the expenditure should be stopped pending the result of such experiments; consequently the House was helpless in the matter, and obliged to depend entirely upon the promise that had been given by the right hon. Baronet. He (Mr. O'Beirne) was naturally anxious to know something about the experiments after that, but months passed away and nothing was heard of them. However, in October last a small paragraph appeared in that vigilant journal, the Standard, announcing that experiments had taken place on the 25th of that month, and that in two shots the shield fired at had been knocked to pieces. It was further stated in the same journal that the shield after it had been fired at was carefully wrapped up in a tarpaulin, and that a sentry was placed over it to prevent anyone from ascertaining the actual amount of damage. There was another peculiar feature connected with that transaction. The usual practice of admitting the representatives of the Press to witness these experiments was departed from. He had it on the authority of a gentleman connected with the Press that he was refused admission, being informed that orders had been sent down from London that no stranger whatever was to be present at the experiment. In the following November Session of Parliament the hon. Member for the Queen's County (General Dunne) put a Question to the right hon. Baronet with reference to these experiments, and he (Mr. O'Beirne) subsequently followed that up with Questions with regard to the Malta and Gibraltar shields and the fortifications generally. The reply of the hon. Baronet to those Questions would no doubt be in the recollection of hon. Members who took an interest in the subject. He (Mr. O'Beirne) had also asked the right hon. Baronet (Sir John Pakington), whether the specifications and drawings issued by the War Office for the intended target were a true section of the Plymouth and the Bermuda forts; the noble Lord the Member for Haddington (Lord Elcho) having been informed that they were not. The right hon. Baronet said, that he was not aware that there had been any alteration; that he had given the most strict injunctions that the target should be a correct and faithful representation of the Plymouth and Bermuda forts, as it was intended to erect them, and that if there was any variation it was this—that as it was difficult to give a target the strength and stability of a permanent structure some additional supports might have been used for that purpose; but in all substantive respects they were the same. Now, he (Mr. O'Beirne) regretted to say that the facts of the case were totally at variance with the opinion which the right hon. Baronet had expressed. The target, which was ordered in the North of England, was in many respects different from the fort now building in the neighbourhood of London, and it in no degree represented the fortification of which it was intended to be an identical example. More than that, the target, he was informed, had, since it had gone to Shoeburyness, been subjected to repeated alterations at an expense of £10,000; and if the fort now erecting in the neighbourhood of London were altered in the same manner it would cost £20,000 more than the amount contracted for. If that statement were untrue or unfounded he would be happy to have it contradicted.

Mr. O'Beirne

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. What does he mean by the fort erecting in the neighbourhood of London?

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he meant the Plymouth Breakwater fort, which was being constructed at Millwall. But in addition to the objections he had already made, he arraigned the fort as unsound in principle, if, indeed, there could be said to be any principle in a plan which was being altered from day to day. But however the plan might be altered or modified, it was still, and always would be, an erroneous one. The structure was of iron, placed upon stone and mortar; and in the iron construction the laminated principle was adopted—a principle which experiment had also proved to be faulty; while stone and mortar, as a base, were, as he had shown, equally so. He now came to the question of the shields. It seemed to him that prudence might have suggested to the right hon. Baronet to have stayed the erection of these shields till the Report of the Committee, which the hon. Baronet himself had appointed, was received; but he declined to prevent their being sent out, and thirty-four had actually gone to their destination, one being retained at home to be fired at. In addition, fifty of these shields were to form an integral portion of the home defences. They were to be let into the embrasures of forts, built of granite, to protect the gunners. But a shot striking the granite would dislodge the shield and expose the men inside to the fire of the enemy. In speaking upon this subject, he could not refrain from expressing his entire approval of the labours of the Committee presided over by his distinguished and gallant Friend the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay). That Committee had done its work in a very efficient manner. He observed that fault had been found with it by some of the Press, because it had not answered the third question that was submitted to its consideration. But he thought the hon. Baronet had done perfectly right. Those who knew the hon. Baronet knew that he had a thorough knowledge of this difficult question; and those who did not know him had only to look at his examination of the various witnesses before the Committee, and the character of the questions he put to them would prove how thoroughly he had mastered the subject. The Report of the Committee when it appeared, would, he believed, give general satisfaction. If he had any objection to make, it was that the Report was not yet printed and issued to Members. [SIR JOHN HAY: It is printed.] It must have been printed only to day—at least he had not got a copy. And here he must complain that he had seen with extreme surprise articles in the Press for the last fortnight commenting on the Report, the character of the evidence, and the nature of the findings, while the Members of the House had not seen it. It might be worth while to ask the Speaker's opinion, whether this was regular—it was certainly scarcely courteous. But, passing from that, he would call the attention of the House to this Report on the shields. It was believed that they were useless and unfitted for their purpose. After a great deal of trouble and loss of time a Committee was appointed on the 5th of December last, and it made its Report on the 11th of February. There were three questions put to the Committee—the first two were vital; the third, he thought, with great respect, had better not have been put. The first question was, how far have these trials proved favourable to the shields? the second, what are the causes which have led to any failure in the shields? and the third was, what changes in the construction of the shields the Committee would recommend? He was glad, as he had already said, that the Committee declined to give an answer to the third question, as it was not fair to ask them to decide a matter so important in a few weeks, and if they had fixed on any particular shield they ought to have been allowed to superintend its construction. To the first question the Committee answered that they had considered the result of the first trial by the Ordnance Select Committee, on the 21st October, 1867—that was the remarkable trial when the shield was wrapped up in a tarpaulin—and other experiments made since, and they had come to a conclusion unfavourable to the shields, as they did not consider them strong enough to resist the direct attack of powerful ordnance at a distance of 200 yards. They went on to specify as defects the weakness of the girders, and the danger to the gunners from the number of nuts and screws that were liable to be displaced in action. On the other hand, it was stated that the construction adopted allowed of the strengthening of the shield by the super-imposition of additional plates. He thought, then, he had established a case for inquiry, and for pausing in the present expenditure. He would conclude by asking the House to agree to a Resolution to the effect that there be added to the Committee two Members of this House and an additional Engineer; and that all further outlay be suspended till that Committee should have made its Report to the House. Of the £11,000,000 which was first estimated as the cost of the forts, they had already spent £5,000,000: he hoped the House would refuse to sanction any further waste of money until it had full knowledge of how and with what probable results such expenditure should be incurred. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Resolution.

Mr. O'Beirne

COLONEL SYKES, in seconding the Resolution, said, that in 1860 the Defence Commission recommended a system of fortifications involving an expenditure of £11,000,000. Subsequently to 1860 there was a re-consideration of the subject; there was a modification of the plan of the Defence Commission, and the expenditure was reduced to £6,000,000 or £7,000,000. In 1860, he opposed the system of fortifications then recommended. He knew it was impossible to defend our whole sea coast, and therefore he was of opinion that the defence of our arsenals was all that should be undertaken. In 1867, he moved for a Return, and he proposed that the modifications should be set in detail, with a statement as to costs past and prospective, &c. The Return laid on the table in consequence of the Motion made by him showed that the total outlay proposed up to that date was £6,995,000, independently of armament and troops. Up to the 1st of January, 1867, there had been expended upon the works £3,491,872. It was stated that 987 large rifled guns would be required, and 1,104 guns of 95 cwt. and under. The estimated cost of the armament was £1,883,722; the number of artillerymen required would be 9,841; and the number of infantry 22,441. It also appeared from the Return that the land to be purchased would cost no less than £1,064,761; that the actual expenditure up to the first of January, 1867, was £4,556,633; and that £2,438,367 more would be required to complete the fortifications alone. Now, if the works had been of a suitable character—if they had been properly placed and properly built, and if, above all, they had been necessary—the country might, perhaps, have overlooked this enormous expenditure. But there had been annually communicated to him statements to the effect that the fortifications were neither properly placed nor properly built, and that they were not adapted to the purpose for which they were designed. In fact, it had been represented to him that some were on overhanging cliffs, so that in time they would topple over into the sea, or on swampy ground, where the foundation was unstable and treacherous, so that the magazines had cracked, the ramparts had slipped from their bases and filled up the surrounding fosse. The forts erected on Portadown Hill stood on a mass of chalk. Now, if any geologist had been consulted as to the appropriateness of such a site, he would at once have said that the concussion caused by the great guns being fired from the fortifications would in time make the scarps of the chalk itself crumble away, from the friable nature of the chalk. In particular he wished to direct attention to a letter which was published in The Times newspaper of the 10th of March last year, in reference to some remarks made on this subject by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for War.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON remarked that he was not Secretary of State for War at the date mentioned.

COLONEL SYKES admitted that he had made a mistake. The letter appeared in The Times on the 10th of March this year.

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was not in order in reading a newspaper comment on a debate which had occurred in the present Session.

COLONEL SYKES went on to remark that The Times on the 14th of March, 1868, contained a long criticism on the state of the Spithead forts; but he would not read it to the House, as it extended to three or four columns. With regard to the question raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Cashel (Mr. O'Beirne) respecting shields being applied to masonry, he wished to point out that the engineers of the Defence Commission ought to have known that experiments had been made in America as to the application of iron shields to granite defences, and that it had failed absolutely,—it being found, as indeed might have been expected, that when such shields were placed upon a very reasonable one. He trusted that the right hon. Baronet would consent to give additional weight to the Committee he had appointed by nominating upon it another distinguished Civil Engineer and two competent and impartial Members of that House. He supported that suggestion without the smallest personal object, because he frankly admitted that he had a bias in the matter. He was not competent to be a Member of the Committee, having from the first entertained a strong prejudice against the general system of fortifications adopted, embracing as it did not less than seventy-one defences; but he trusted that no further expense would be incurred in the direction spoken of by his hon. Friend until the investigation which was recommended had taken place. He believed that the true defences of the country would be found, not in fortifications, but in the stout hearts and strong arms of the people.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "two Members of this House and another Civil Engineer should be added to the Committee appointed to consider the question of the Fortifications for the defence of the United Kingdom and of the Colonies, and that arrangements shall be made to stop, as far as possible, all further outlay until that Committee shall have reported to this House."

—(Mr. O'Beirne.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the deal of money. more recently in both cases the away. And in same manner the seven years would he asked, was I take possession of them at all. A was the use of could understand the arsenals might was no hurry. Volunteers, and more than all the

MR. OSBORN some Gentlemen verment would able statement Member for Cam had been forcible ance which the presented. The to the public as public purse. A spect of a debt acrimonious realities, the Beg crowded, and th sounded with ob the state of the of the discussion the expenditure ably brought for the representative —and the high the House at a and furnished an example of the most profligate and useless expenditure that was ever voted by the "guardians of the public purse." In 1860 a Royal Commission was issued to report upon the defences of the country. And here he might remark that the whole theory of Government seemed now to be this — that everything was to be referred to a Royal Commission, the consequence being that the Ministry abdicated all responsibility, and sheltered themselves under the recommendations of a Commission. They all knew that the Vote for fortifications was passed, in the first instance, under the influence of a panic. The total estimate was £11,850,000, and the works at Portsmouth alone were to cost £1,192,000. These works extended over seventeen miles; and the House rushed into this expenditure without considering that works of that vast extent would require at least 30,000 men to defend them. [Sir JOHN HAY: 80,000.] He had never ventured to put the number so high as that. He wished to ask the hon. and gallant Gentleman how, in the face of that statement, he could oppose the present Motion? An army of 80,000 men to defend the works of Portsmouth alone! Where are the men to come from? The Volunteers could not supply them. The Royal Commission of 1860 recommended that £1,000,000 should be expended on floating batteries, together with £500,000 for their armaments. That was the most sensible recommendation which emanated from that Commission; but what had happened? The whole of the money had been expended upon these useless forts, and not one 1*d.* had been laid out upon floating batteries. As far back as 1860 he resisted the expenditure on fortifications and proposed that floating batteries should be built, and how was he supported on that occasion? He was supported by thirty-nine Members, who, in derision, were called the Thirty-nine Articles. He persevered in his proposal until at length he worked up the minority to 84. What happened then? The hon. and gallant Admiral now in office (Sir John Hay) seconded a Motion made by a gallant officer of Engineers, then a Member of that House (Sir Frederick Smith), to the effect that these forts should not be proceeded with. [Sir JOHN HAY: Hear, hear!] The same hon. and gallant Gentleman stated in 1862 that he had been at one time in favour of the forts at Spithead, but that he had since had reason to change his opinion, and he recommended that floating batteries should be constructed. That recommendation was backed up by a great naval authority, the late Sir Richard Dundas, who recommended that instead of constructing floating batteries they should expend £60,000 in rendering iron-clad vessels available for purposes of defence in our harbours. The recommendations of these able officers and scientific men had, however, been totally disregarded. What he complained of was that the House had never had before it a proper estimate for these fortifications. The original plan had been altogether departed from, and public money had been thrown away and wasted in the sands at Spithead. According to the original plan there were to be five forts; but only three were in process of construction. It should be recollected that the original estimate for these forts did not contemplate any iron construction. They were to be built of granite, and it was not until Admiral Elliot, a member of the Royal Commission, said they ought to be covered with wrought iron ten inches thick, that the estimate was completely altered; and now the House was involved in an enormous and indefinite expense, without any plan before it. He suspected, moreover, that there was no working plan for the regular construction of fortifications. The present Government had, it was true, succeeded to a damnosa hereditas; but having succeeded to this damnosa hereditas, what was the common sense of their position now? He knew that the Government did not approve of these works. [Mr. Serjeant GASELER: They say that the contracts were made.] He believed that the contractors for them would, upon the payment of a certain sum of money, be glad to wash their hands of them. He would, therefore advise the Government to close this account and to put an end to a gigantic imposture which was wringing money out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country. It was all very well for the Government to try and get rid of the responsibility. They were all tarred with the same brush. The right hon. Gentleman on the other side of the House (General Peel) said he would not accept one atom of responsibility with regard to the forts — that they were the work of the last Government. But why did the party to which the hon. and gallant General belonged vote a large sum of money for the purpose of continuing the fortifications? He could not understand a Government which, knowing this outlay of money to be uncalled for, remained in Office and allowed this wasteful expenditure to go on. While he cordially concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Cashel (Mr. O'Beirne) in his representation of facts, he doubted whether, if his suggestion to add two Members of that House and one Civil Engineer to the Committee were acceded to, there would be any Report at all. He had no confidence in Members of that House reporting upon fortifications; for it was entirely owing to hon. Members that they had been involved in this extravagant outlay of money at all. He was ready to vote a sum of money with a view to closing the contracts. He hoped that some Member of the Government would explain exactly how matters at present stood, and the reason why that most sensible recommendation of the Royal Commissioners, that £1,000,000 should be expended on floating batteries, had been wholly disregarded. They heard a great deal about responsibility. He would read to the House one of the most useful bits of advice ever given by a Minister to the House of Commons. Sir Robert Peel said that, in a time of peace, this country should not be looking to keep up an extensive system of fortifications, and that if the House listened to the opinions of military men, who were always ready to recommend something connected with their own profession, they would involve this country in an outlay that no amount of funds would cover. That was the opinion of Sir Robert Peel in 1846. He would ask hon. Members to take that advice—and as an election was at hand they might be the more inclined to listen to it now than at another time—and to support the Motion of his hon. Friend for the suspension of this useless expenditure.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the hon. Gentleman had fairly quoted him as having always been opposed to these fortifications, for the building of which he was by no means responsible; but he could not conceive that the House which was really responsible for them would interpret unfavourably the action of the present Government in continuing the contracts which were in operation when they succeeded to Office. The sea forts at Spithead he believed to be entirely useless; indeed, they would prove admirable marks to guide an expert enemy into the harbour, while, as Sir Frederick Smith said, in a former debate, in these days of iron-clad vessels they would not be able to keep the enemy out. But when the present Government succeeded to Office these fortifications were raised considerably above their foundations and formed sand banks, and it was thought that the best use they could be put to was to place upon them the fortifications for which the contracts had been already made. With regard to the special question as to floating defences recommended by the Commission, raised by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) he had to inform him that this was one of the first things considered by the Admiralty after succeeding to Office; but they found that while the House of Commons had agreed to the Vote for the land fortifications, they had struck out the £1,000,000 for the floating batteries. He hoped the hon. Member for Cashel (Mr. O'Beirne) would not press his proposal for adding two Members of that House to the Committee, the members of which had been selected with the greatest care and attention, while its Chairman (Sir Frederick Grey), an Admiral of distinguished ability, had certainly not been selected with reference to his political views. The Committee in its present form was a most effective one, and one from which might be expected not only a full and honest but also a speedy Report. He did not think there would be any objection to the addition of a Civil Engineer to the Committee; but such an appointment would, of course, considerably add to its expense. He hoped the House would see that the Government was not responsible for the expenditure incurred with reference to these fortifications; but at the same time he must remind hon. Members that the contracts already in force could not be put an end to without a considerable loss being thrown upon the public. It was one thing to disapprove of commencing such fortifications, but quite another to leave them in a half-finished state. He trusted that the hon. Member for Cashel (Mr. O'Beirne) would not press his Motion after the explanation he had given of the circumstances connected with these works.

Mr. Osborne

MR. SAMUDA, as an Independent Member, would say that to him it was no matter who projected or agreed with these fortifications. If, on re-examination, they were considered useless, they ought to be discontinued. After the statement of the hon. Baronet (Sir John Hay), a naval Lord of the Admiralty, that the Spithead forts would enable an enemy to obtain a better position in the country than if they were not there, a revision of this question was important to the country. He had understood from the Secretary of State for War that it would take £4,000,000 to pay for the necessary guns. That was another reason why the subject should be re-considered. He believed that only £7,000,000 out of the £12,000,000, of the original Estimate, had been spent upon these fortifications, which took their origin in a time of panic, and the permission to construct which was obtained from the House upon a statement that was now found to be wholly unsatisfactory. In 1860 it was represented that the arsenals and dock-yards at Portsmouth and Plymouth were undefended, and that these fortifications were necessary to protect them from an enemy. Now the point to which he wished to call attention was that in ancient times, when the navy of this country relied exclusively on sails for their evolutions, it was absolutely necessary, in time of war, to possess Portsmouth and Plymouth; but that necessity did not now exist, when this country had a steam navy which could be speedily directed to any particular spot. Whether the fleet issued from Chatham, Pembroke, or Portsmouth, mattered not. Adverse winds did not stop the ships. It might be well in time of war to abandon those great arsenals, or even destroy them if necessary. It should be remembered, too, that we were making Chatham Dock-yard large enough for all the works of the navy. It was an opinion, confirmed by high military authority, that the defence of the country could never be made in these forts. As long as we possessed the command of the sea we were safe, and if we lost the command of the sea, not one of these forts would be useful except to the enemy. His opinion was, and had always been, that this country should depend mainly, if not entirely, upon her ships, and that the number ought to be made equal to those of two or three of the greatest European Powers combined. That being done, if an enemy should obtain a footing in this country, it would be better for our army to be posted about forty miles inland so as to draw the enemy that distance from his base of operations. That would be a better base for operations, and for stopping a successful raid being made upon the metropolis. If these fortifications were completed, we could not spare an army to man them. The constitution of the Committee was not a matter of so much importance, but what was wanted was to get the matter thoroughly re-considered and revised. He hoped if the hon. Member for Cashel (Mr. O'Beirne) should be induced to withdraw his proposition the matter would not be allowed to slumber.

GENERAL PERCY HERBERT said, he supposed that, as there was "nothing like leather," it was natural that the hon. Member for Tavistock (Mr. Samuda) should prefer ships to forts. If the House agreed with the hon. Member that Portsmouth and Plymouth were now of no consequence, the fortifications there would no doubt be unnecessary. But the construction of those fortifications was based on the belief that the arsenals at Portsmouth and Plymouth were necessary for the maintenance of that naval supremacy upon which the hon. Member himself laid so much stress. The forts at those two places were not designed for use so long as we maintained the command of the sea; but in case that which had occurred should be repeated, and a British fleet should be compelled to retire before the advancing fleets of the enemy. That was the contingency to meet which these forts were constructed, so as, in the event of a hostile fleet getting the command of the Channel, to prevent the arsenals of Portsmouth and Plymouth from falling into the enemy's hands.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE said, the hon. Member for Nottingham had accused him of being asleep. There would be nothing very wrong in his "taking a nap," especially after the heavy debates they had lately been listening to, but if he had been asleep during the discussion he was not aware of it. At all events he was not asleep during the astounding statement that Portsmouth and Plymouth might be done away with. It was not the first time he had heard the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Samuda) advocate the employment of private instead of public yards, and of course on the ground of "nothing like leather," it was easy to see why the hon. Member should wish to do away with the latter. With regard to these fortifications, he disapproved of them entirely, but he looked forward to no diminution of expense so long as this old Parliament continued. He only wished the right hon. Member for Calne (Mr. Lowe) was there. That right hon. Gentleman had described the excellence of the late and the present Parliament. In that he (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee) did not agree. He looked forward to a new Parliament very different from the present, and the reason why he had taken such a prominent part in obtaining household suffrage was his belief that, in Parliaments elected by the new constituencies, we should have no abuses like this, which made the House of Commons stink aloud. No Parliament in its senses, no Parliament elected under household suffrage would, even under the magic wand of Lord Palmerston—who was the most wonderful mesmerist he had ever seen—ever have consented to such a futile and outrageous outlay of public money. These fortifications were ordered under the influence of panic; and we never knew what we might do when we became old women, and yielded to panic. It was an ill wind that blew nobody any good, and his constituents at Portsmouth had benefited by this expenditure, though nobody else had. At the same time they would not wish their private interests to stand in the way of the public good. This was the reason they did not hear him perpetually boring the House upon naval questions, or asking for an increase of pay to dockyard artificers. His constituents sent him here to represent not their petty interests, but those of the public at large. The proposed addition of a Civil Engineer to the Commission was, in his opinion, a valuable suggestion, and he thought that arrangement would work very advantageously though he owned he abhorred Commissions and Committees altogether. But he hoped that, after the admission of a Lord of the Admiralty that these forts were useless, the Government would urge the Commission to expedite their labours, as had been done in the case of the Irish Church Commission, which went on slowly until the right hon. Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) introduced his Resolutions; and he trusted that an early Report would be obtained, and an end put to this outlay.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he could feel no surprise that the hon. and learned Serjeant who had just spoken should entertain great objection to any proposal to do away with Portsmouth, but he did not intend to discuss the proposal of the hon. Member for Tavistock (Mr. Samuda), that it might be desirable to suspend Portsmouth and Plymouth during war. He wished, however, to refer to a statement he had made on a former evening, and to which the hon. Member for Tavistock had adverted, as to the armament required for rendering our fortifications defensible. What he said was, that it would require for the armament of our fortifications a number of rifled modern guns, not less than 3,000, involving an expenditure of, at least, £4,000,000. He did not say over how long a period the expenditure was to be spread, or what were the best modes of obtaining the money; and when he made that statement he did not allude only to the fortifications they were now discussing, and which were proposed by Lord Palmerston. He referred to what would be required to enable our fortresses in all parts of the world—including Malta, Gibraltar, Bermuda, and Halifax—to resist any enemy who came to attack them with the advantage of modern arms. The hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) had complained, perhaps not unnaturally, of the thin attendance in the House at a time when, instead of an acrimonious party debate, they had to discuss a question relating to the expenditure of millions of money. But while he admitted there was force in that observation, he would remind the hon. Gentleman—it was only just to the House of Commons to do so—that if hon. Members were to come down to attend to the expenditure of “millions of money,” it was right and proper that they should receive due notice of the purpose and object for which they are expected to be present. He did not complain of the hon. Member for Cashel (Mr. O’Beirne) for bringing forward this subject; on the contrary he gave credit to any Member on either side of the House who called attention to the immense expenditure incurred and being incurred in this system of fortifications, and he always admitted that the more carefully Parliament attended to that expenditure the better. But he did regret the terms and the manner in which the hon. Member for Cashel had brought forward the subject. The Notice was—

Mr. Serjeant Gaselee

“To call the attention of the House to the plans upon which the Fortifications for the defence of the Dockyards and Naval Arsenals of the United Kingdom and for the defence of our Colonies are being constructed; and to move a Resolution.”

He had had to meet the hon. Member before on this subject, and it had been frequently discussed. He had not been able to collect from the terms of the Notice what was the object the hon. Member had in view. And when the hon. Member said he intended to move a Resolution, he appealed to every Member whether it was not the uniform practice, in courtesy between the two sides, that when a Resolution was to be moved on an important subject, and tending to throw blame on a great Department, the terms of that Resolution should be put on the Paper? The hon. Gentleman commenced his speech by referring to the early experiments made at the commencement of this system of fortifications in 1860. These experiments were made under the immediate superintendence of his hon. and gallant Friend near him (Sir John Hay), in his capacity of Chairman of the Iron Plate Committee, and therefore it would be for his hon. and gallant Friend rather than for him to enter into an explanation of those experiments. But with regard to the system of fortifications, he did not think they were now treated with all the fairness they might claim. The hon. Member for Nottingham spoke of them as the result of a profligate and useless expenditure. [Mr. OSBORNE: I spoke of the expenditure on the Spithead forts.] It was the fashion in the House at the present time to ridicule and decry the expenditure on these fortifications. Now he was fond of justice and fair play. He had no more to do with these fortifications than the hon. Member for Cashel, who introduced this discussion, and the present Government was entirely free from praise or blame in regard to them. [Mr. OSBORNE: You voted for them.] His best reply to the hon. Member for Nottingham was this—that he (Sir John Pakington) never joined in condemnation of Lord Palmerston for proposing, them and those who were supporters and members of Lord Palmerston's Government—who, year after year supported him—should rather abstain from throwing on him the odium of profligate and useless and absurd expenditure. [Mr. OSBORNE: I never said so.] He (Sir John Pakington) never was a supporter of Lord Palmerston; he was always in political opposition to him, but he would say this—he did not believe any man ever exercised power in that House who was more thoroughly English in his views and feelings, or more anxious to exercise the great power he possessed for the honour and interests of the country. Whether right or wrong, he proposed and advocated this system of fortifications with most patriotic and honourable intentions; and when hon. Gentlemen criticized with so much severity those who had carried that system into effect he must say, in justice and fair play, they ought to bear in mind more than they did the changes that had occurred in our armament and the whole military system since the fortifications were commenced. [Lord ELCHO: Look at the contracts of 1867.] He was not referring to contracts—he was answering a speech which he had just listened to. If his noble Friend had anything to say about contracts he would meet him by-and-by. His noble Friend was one of those who referred to the fortifications with undue severity. He (Sir John Pakington) was not responsible for the system which Lord Palmerston thought it right to commence. He was not the advocate of the system, and he was free from all prejudice or concern in the matter except for the last year. What, then, was the state of affairs—what was our military system in 1860? A great portion of the speech of the hon. Member for Cashel had been devoted to a question of how much of our fortifications should consist of granite and how much of iron. [Mr. O'BRIEN: I said nothing about any part being of granite.] He did not intend to misrepresent the hon. Gentleman, the early part of whose speech was certainly devoted to the question as to how far iron ought to be an ingredient in these fortifications. Why, in 1860, nobody ever thought of putting iron into fortifications. What led to the introduction of iron? What but the clothing of our ships with iron? In 1860 no such things as iron ships existed. There had been, indeed, floating batteries, but there were no iron men-of-war; and at that period the system of warfare was between granite forts and wooden ships. No doubt the changes that took place after 1860 were very rapid; but, as he had to advert to other subjects which had been referred to by several hon. Members, he would not further detain the House by dwelling on that early period. He would come now to 1864 and 1865. Experiments were made in those years which the hon. Gentleman had treated, as far as he (Sir John Pakington) was aware, with perfect fairness; and the result of those experiments was to prove, first that a construction of solid iron was much more to be depended on than one of laminated iron; and, secondly, that a construction of iron and stone was not so powerful as one of iron alone. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) had entered into a good deal of matter which really did not bear upon this question, for he had alluded to the American experience of the great imperfections of granite backing to iron fronts. He (Sir John Pakington) was not aware that plan had ever been adopted in any of our English fortifications, and therefore, he would not dwell upon the subject. Then the hon. Member for Cashel went on to say that the question still remained unsettled. That was perfectly true, experiments were still in progress. He now came to a period for which he admitted his entire responsibility. It was a very short period, comparatively, in the history of these fortifications—namely, the time which had elapsed since he had the honour to be called to the office that he now filled—the time since 1867, to which the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire had so often referred. The hon. Member for Cashel had alluded to what had taken place in connection with the experiments to be tried on what was called the Plymouth fort. He hoped that the hon. Gentleman did not impute to him anything like a breach of faith in these transactions; for he could assure the hon. Member and the House that no imputation was ever more thoroughly undeserved. [Mr. O'BEIRNE: I had no such intention.] He was glad the hon. Gentleman had disclaimed it, because from the time he had become responsible he had been deeply sensible of the difficulty and importance of the subject, and whenever he had to speak of it he endeavoured to do so with the utmost candour and fairness. He thought, however, that the hon. Member had, he was sure unintentionally, misrepresented his promise. The hon. Gentleman said that he (Sir John Pakington) had promised last year that experiments should be made on the Plymouth fort and on shields. Now, when he made the promise with regard to the Plymouth fort he gave no promise with respect to shields, and he thought that no question about shields had then arisen. His noble Friend the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) brought the question of the Plymouth fort from time to time before the House, and what he (Sir John Pakington) promised was this, that, so far as he could exercise his influence, there should be a bond fide trial of that fort, and that the experiment should be made upon a target which should represent the fort as it was intended to be erected. His noble Friend and the hon. Gentleman had alluded to what they described as a certain change in the drawings. [Lord ELCHO: Hear, hear!] Now, he must frankly confess that he was not so much in the secret as his noble Friend seemed to be—he did not know to what extent the change in the drawings had taken place. He had no desire to shield the officers concerned more than was fair. On the other hand, he had a great desire that the officers who were responsible should not be entirely run down and condemned. He thought the House would be disposed to agree with him that if a public officer charged with a great responsibility, for which very few public officers had the necessary ability and skill—if such an officer, charged with the construction of those great works for the defence of England, found, from experience, after he had made his first designs, that those designs could be improved upon and made more fit for the purpose, he ought not to be made the object of censure and condemnation for making the improvement. It should be remembered, too, that this was a time when not only every year, but almost every month was adding to our knowledge on these subjects. He would go no further, but he thought it sufficient to say that in the case supposed, even if there had been some change in the drawings, it ought not to be made a subject of too severe condemnation. He had already said that his promise was that, so far as he had the power, the target should be a correct representation of the fort to be afterwards constructed; but it should be always borne in mind—and it was a part of the case—that it was very difficult to construct a target with the real consistency of the fort, because they could not expect to find in a target of a few yards broad, the strength which the size, shape, and weight of one part of a fortress must give to another. Therefore, this was a thing in which some licence should be allowed. He was happy to say, however, that the preparations for the trial of the target were almost complete, and he hoped his noble Friend would not think it unfair that the target should represent two different constructions, and two different degrees of strength. It would be divided into two parts, one of which would represent what was intended to be the construction of the fort. The hon. Gentleman had complained that the target at Shoeburyness had been constantly altered. Now, he knew nothing about this; he had never heard that any such changes had been made, and his desire was to ascertain the facts before saying anything more on the subject. He came now to the experiments which had been made with respect to the shields. And there he thought the hon. Member for Cashel had been a little unfair when he said in speaking of his (Sir John Pakington's) conduct last autumn that "after much loss of time a Committee was appointed." Now, the facts were these. They did not hear until October—and the hon. Gentleman himself had fixed that month—of the trials of the two shields. He was very sorry they had not been tried long before, and he quite admitted that they ought to have been tried long before they were sent to Gibraltar and Malta. He believed it was owing to the great pressure of the moment for national defence that they were hurried out as fast as possible; therefore, he threw no blame on any one. But the trial was made, the shield failed, and what was his course? As far as he remembered he did not allow a week to pass before he requested his hon. and gallant Friend next him (Sir John Hay) to resume his old post as Chairman of the Iron Plate Committee—and no more competent body could be got—with the view of resuming the experiments and testing the quality of the shields. His hon. and gallant Friend discharged that duty with his usual ability. It appeared that the hon. Member had seen the Report, and had expressed himself satisfied with it. He hoped, therefore, the hon. Member would not be disposed to find fault with the course which he had taken. He had here to remark on a part of the practice of that House which had prevailed for some few years, that certain portions of their Papers—but what they were, or where the line was drawn, he did not know—were sent to an Office, and were not in the hands of Members unless they chose to ask for them. Great inconvenience arose from this practice, and in the present instance the hon. Member ought to have been in possession of the information which one of these Papers which were not distributed contained. I have myself suffered from this non-distribution of Papers, and I am satisfied that, though the omission is traceable to considerations of economy, the public interests suffer from it. With regard to the Committee which he had lately appointed, he had formerly stated, in answer to a question asked by the hon. Member himself, the motives which had led to its appointment. Not long ago there was a discussion on the subject of the fortifications, and the House was then told that some of them were constructed on marshy ground, that some had cracked, that the scarps had fallen in; that others were built on chalky ground, and could not be relied on; that, in fact, they were in an unsatisfactory state, considering the money which had been spent on them. Now, it was too late to talk about the original plans, and he was not responsible for them; but he had no doubt that the able men called in by Lord Palmerston acted to the best of their ability at the time, and availed themselves of all the scientific knowledge of the day. The complaints to which he had referred rested on the mere assertion, first of one amateur and then of another, for he could only regard his noble Friend the Member for Haddington—if his noble Friend would forgive him for saying so—as an amateur. His noble Friend fortified himself by reading an extract from the St. Paul's Magazine. He had never heard before of the St. Paul's Magazine. He had a great respect for St. Paul, but not for St. Paul's Magazine. Then down came the hon. and gallant Member for Aberdeen one night, and the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire on another night, with their remarks on the question. When he asked the hon. and gallant Member for his authority, he said it was a writer in The Times, whose name he knew but must not tell. Yet, those were the grounds upon which the decision of men of the highest scientific character—men like Sir John Burgoyne—was to be impugned and condemned, and their works stigmatized. However, he thought the time was come to meet these anonymous and amateur censures, and he accordingly appointed a Committee of Inquiry, and put at the head of it an officer of great distinction and ability, Sir Frederick Grey, in whose competence and honour he had entire trust. With that officer he associated Mr. Hawkshaw, Colonel Harness, Colonel Simmons, and Colonel Dixon. He had since added to the Committee an eminent artillery officer, Colonel Evans, and he did not believe he could have selected men more worthy of public confidence. He hoped that the House would be content to wait for the Report of that Committee, composed, as it was, of such competent persons; and he must decline to accede to the Resolution moved by the hon. Member who had departed most inconveniently from the practice of the House, in not having given notice of the import of his Motion. The Resolution embraced two propositions. The first was that all further expense with regard to the fortifications should be suspended. Now, to that proposition, he could not assent, as it would touch a large amount of existing contracts. The hon. Member desired to add to the Committee two Members of that House and a Civil Engineer. Now, he was as desirous as anyone that the constitution of the Committee should give satisfaction, but he doubted whether the Committee would derive any additional strength from having two Members of that House upon it, or acquire additional power by being made more numerous.

Sir John Pakington

Mr. CHILDERS confessed that he felt some difficulty in addressing the House on the subject, because, from the want of proper notice of the Resolution, no one could tell what precise proposition was to be brought forward. At the same time he could not help noticing the remarkable line taken that evening by Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench. Lord Palmerston's policy and the responsibility of the present Government in connection with it had been treated in a manner entirely undefensible. The House was pretty severely lectured the other night from the Treasury Bench upon the matter of expenditure, and told that those who did not object to any particular public expenditure were just as responsible for it as those who proposed it. If that were true, how much more responsible must be those who not only did not object to the expenditure for the fortifications, but voted for it. He had taken the trouble to refer to the record which showed who did and who did not support the particular policy with respect to these fortifications which was adopted in 1860, and he found, among other names in favour of the proposal, which was then made by the Government of Lord Palmerston on the subject, the names of the First Minister of the Crown, the Secretary of State for War, the First Lord of the Admiralty, the Secretary of State for India, and several other Gentlemen by whom his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) was now cheered. When, therefore, his hon. and gallant Friend told the House, not only that the present Government were in no way responsible for those fortifications, but that the fortifications themselves were, to a great extent, useless, his hon. and gallant Friend must excuse him for enlarging on the doctrine which had been laid down, and maintaining that the occupants of the Treasury Bench were responsible for those useless works. He hoped, he might add, that hon. Members would not run away with the idea that it was any light matter which they were discussing. He himself was perfectly free so far as the original question of the construction of those fortifications was concerned, inasmuch as he had taken no part in the two divisions on the original Resolutions of 1860. Standing in that position he must say he thought, after the declaration of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War, the public mind should be set at rest on the subject. The words which the right hon. Baronet had used towards the end of his speech were, in his opinion, perfectly sound, and he could not blame him for saying that he was not prepared to adopt a Resolution like that under discussion without notice, and under all the circumstances of the case, seeing that there was a large number of contracts at the present moment on hand. That being the view of the Government, he would suggest to his hon. Friend the Member for Cashel that, instead of the second part of his Resolution, the terms of which he was sure he would admit were too trenchant, he should accept the following words by way of Amendment:—

Sir John Pakington

"That in the opinion of this House, no further outlay on the Fortifications for the defence of the United Kingdom and of the Colonies, except such as may be absolutely necessary under existing Contracts, or to complete works which cannot be suspended without serious inconvenience, ought to be incurred until the Report of the Committee recently appointed, shall have been laid before this House."

A Resolution like that would, he believed, if adopted entirely satisfy the public mind, and be in accordance with that moderate course which his right hon. Friend at the conclusion of his speech pointed out. Then again, with reference to the first proposition of his hon. Friend, "that two Members of this House and a Civil Engineer be added to the Committee," he wished to say that he objected to the proposed appointment of Members of that House, inasmuch as it would have the effect of taking away, in a great measure, the responsibility in the matter, which ought to rest solely on the shoulders of the Executive Government; and his right hon. Friend had promised that he would appoint a civil engineer. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Cashel would accept the Amendment which he had suggested.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he had no wish to inconvenience the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for War, or act discourteously towards him or the House. The best course would be to move the adjournment of the debate; but as that could not be done, he should not press his Motion to a division.

LORD ELCHO said, he should not have trespassed on the attention of the House had he not understood that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War had in his absence coupled his name with that of St. Paul. Now, he had quoted on a former occasion from the St. Paul's Magazine because the article from which the quotations were extracted, appeared to him to be a very able one, and to have been written by a person who thoroughly understood the subject on which he was writing. He should not, perhaps, have referred to it had not an article of a similar character been published in The Times newspaper, in consequence of which a question had been put by the gallant General opposite (General Dunne) to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War (Sir John Pakington), in reply to whose answer The Times' correspondent wrote a letter, maintaining the accuracy of his original statement. But, be that as it might, the country had, at all events, he thought, good reason to rejoice that the St. Paul's Magazine and the communication of The Times' correspondent had been quoted in that House, for it was, perhaps, not a little owing to that circumstance that an inquiry into the real state of the fortifications was instituted. He had never questioned the propriety of the Report of the Commission issued by Lord Palmerston, and which recommended the expenditure of the public money upon fortifications; but, assuming that it was necessary that they should be constructed, he had expressed his doubts as to whether the nation was getting the worth of the money expended, and experience had now shown that it might as well have been thrown into the sea, because they were not constructed in such a manner as to resist modern artillery. It was from a belief that the Plymouth fort did not fulfil that condition that he last year brought the subject before the House. He admitted that his right hon. Friend, since he had been in Office, had acted with perfect fairness, and had shown every willingness to have a thorough inquiry. But what he had asked of his right hon. Friend last year was to let them have a section of that Plymouth Breakwater fort as per drawing signed by Colonel Jervis on the 19th of January, 1867, and issued to the contractor. His right hon. Friend implied that he (Lord Elcho) was actuated in the course he took by personal motives: he absolutely disclaimed anything of the kind. Whenever the Minister in cases like that defended the acts of an officer in his Department whose conduct was supposed to be impugned by a Member of that House, he invariably elicited a cheer. For himself, however, he did not in the least attack the individual, but the work; and if the work was found to be faulty he left the House and the country to form their own opinion as to whether the individual was or was not to blame. His right hon. Friend undertook that there should be a section of that fort, but a section as it was now intended to be constructed. That was not what was, he believed, the understanding come to between his right hon. Friend and himself last year. That understanding was that it should be a section of the fort, not as it was intended to be constructed at some future time, but as it was intended to be constructed as per drawing signed by Colonel Jervis on the 19th of January, 1867, and issued to the contractor. In November last he had reason to believe there was a departure from that understanding, in so far as that the section which was being constructed was not according to the design as contracted for, and a Question was asked in the House on the subject. He then went abroad, and when he came home in March he had still further reasons to believe that the original understanding was departed from, and had to bring the matter before the House. What he then wanted, and what was promised by his right hon. Friend, was that there should be two drawings published—namely, one of the fort as originally designed, and another of the same section of the fort with such alterations marked and coloured as would show how it was eventually intended to be erected, so that the public might judge between the two. His firm conviction was that the section as it was now intended to be put up and to be fired at would be found to be as different from the fort originally meant to be constructed as that fort of iron differed from the original design of 1860. If there had not been external action—if the question had not been raised in that House, he believed that fort would have been constructed as it was originally designed and contracted for, and that the country would have had a bad article instead of a good one, whereby the public money would have been wasted.

MR. BAZLEY said, he considered that the investment of the public money in fortifications was essentially a bad one, and that, as pointed out in a former debate by General Peel, the real defence of the country was to be found in the fleet and in floating batteries. They had been in reality throwing the money of the national Treasury into the sea. The proposal for the construction of the fortifications was made and agreed to at a time of national panic, when it was supposed that an enemy was about to invade us. But during the past eight years no enemy had invaded them, though the forts had not been constructed, and why should they go on spending this enormous sum of public money on such a chimerical idea? Besides, an enemy would never attempt to land in the face of forts, but would seek some other part of the coast on which to land. They must remember that when the fortifications were constructed, an enormous expense would have to be incurred to defend them; and they would, after all, be perfectly useless. He was glad he was one of the thirty-nine Members who, from the very first, protested and voted against this extravagant expenditure, and was sorry that the House did not take the advice of the right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), who so justly pointed out that, in the event of an enemy landing, they might, by means of the existing railway communication, concentrate troops in a few hours, in any part of the kingdom. No real economy would be effected for the nation, until the execution of these fortifications was totally suspended. Believing that the fortifications, when constructed, would be utterly useless, he would move that all investments in fortifications should, from the present time, cease and determine.

MR. SPEAKER informed the hon. Gentleman that there being an Amendment before the House, the one he had now moved was inadmissible.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that since he had come into Office he had endeavoured to deal with the question in various ways and with the utmost fairness and moderation, and he was obliged to the noble Lord opposite (Lord Elcho) for the admission he had made to that effect. He would appeal to the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), whether it would not be a departure from the usual practice of the House on a matter of great importance if they adopted the proposal he now made? It was a Motion without Notice in reference to a large expenditure, which might be condemned in one moment, and rightly condemned, but which had been going on for a period of eight years. Large sums of money had been expended on works of the greatest national importance; and he submitted to the House with very great confidence that, if they were to reverse their policy and abandon what was done in 1860, they ought not to do so without the fullest notice and the gravest thought. He must say he did not feel at liberty to accept a proposal of that serious importance without a reference to his Colleagues in the Cabinet. The proposal of his hon. Friend who had spoken of the impropriety in the hon. Member for Cashel making a Motion without Notice was itself moved entirely without any Notice; and he appealed to the House whatever its ultimate decision might be, not to proceed with precipitation. He had already promised that the Instructions to the Committee should be laid on the table. Well, they were not going even to wait for those Instructions, and if the Motion of his hon. Friend were accepted by the House he believed it would be necessary to alter them.

MRS. GEORGE GREY said, the right hon. Baronet opposite altogether misunderstood the object of his hon. Friend (Mr. Childers). There were two questions involved, one was whether it was desirable that their great arsenals should be placed in a state in which they could be defended from the attack of a foreign enemy; and the other was, whether the manner in which the fortifications were being executed would best attain the end in view. His hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) had raised no doubt as to the first—he had not proposed a reversal of the present policy, or that the fortifications should not be erected. But the question raised was whether there should be an alteration in the manner of their construction? Complaints having been made that these fortifications were being erected in a way that would render them useless for their object, the Government had very properly appointed a Committee to examine into and carefully report upon the manner in which they were being executed. He believed that the complaints against the fortifications were unfounded, but the appointment of a Select Committee implied that there was some doubt on the subject. There was great force in the objection of the Secretary for War that the Motion had been made without notice, and that, in consequence, he wished to consult his Colleagues. The best plan would therefore be to adjourn the debate. No public inconvenience would arise from postponing any ulterior expenditure, as the Report of the Committee was likely to be obtained in a short time. He would suggest that the debate be now adjourned. [Mr. SPEAKER intimated that this could not be done.] He would then recommend the hon. Member for Cashel to withdraw his Amendment on the understanding that he should have an early opportunity of bringing the matter on again after the right hon. Baronet had consulted his Colleagues.

MR. O'BEIRNE said, he would accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Pontefract.

MR. SAMUDA said, he wished to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Royal Commission made two recommendations—one with reference to fortifications, the other with regard to floating batteries for the defence of our shores. If the matter was re-considered by the Government, it would perhaps be found that they had carried out the less important matter, and neglected the more important of the two.

MR. SPEAKER: The Secretary of State for War has taken exception to the terms of the Notice of the hon. Member for Cashel (Mr. O'Boirne), as not being sufficiently precise and complete, and I should wish to take the direction of the House, as to what should be the practice for the future. It is a rule of the House, that no original Motion should be made without due Notice; but of late years, on the question of going into Committee of Supply on Fridays, the Motions all partake of the nature of original Motions, though made in the form of Amendments to the Motion, "That the Speaker do now leave the Chair;" but they are, in fact, a succession of original Motions, which Members expect will be called on in due order. Now, this is a new practice, and I should like to know if it is the opinion of the House that Notices for Friday should be given in sufficient time and in as complete a form as original Motions. I do not wish to say anything with regard to this particular case, because the practice has not been settled. The Notice to call attention to the question of fortifications, and to move a Resolution by the Member for Cashel, would have been sufficient Notice at a week's distance: but before the day arrived, it would have been suitable and proper that the exact terms of the Resolution should appear upon the Paper. And if that is the general opinion of the House, it is a course that ought to be followed for the future. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), it is not liable to the same objection, because it constantly happens in the course of the debate that the original Motion is objected to, and that having been withdrawn another is substituted more acceptable to the House. I have taken the liberty of making these observations to the House, rather with the view of collecting the opinion of the House with regard to its future practice.

MR. GOSCHEN put it to the hon. Member for Cashel, whether it would not be well to bring this question before the House again? [Cries of "Divide!"] Hon. Members opposite were not acceding to the wish of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for War, who had pleaded that sufficient Notice had not been given. [Renewed cries of "Divide!"] As it seemed the wish of the House to divide, they must each vote according to their convictions, and he had no option, but to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Pontefract.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, no further outlay on the Fortifications for the defence of the United Kingdom and of the Colonies, except such as may be absolutely necessary under existing Contracts, or to complete works which cannot be suspended without serious inconvenience, ought to be incurred until the Report of the Committee recently appointed shall have been laid before this House,"—(Mr. Childers,)

—instead thereof.

Question put. "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 48: Majority 45.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

INDIA—BANK OF BOMBAY.—QUESTION.

MR. AYRTON said, he supposed the House would not go into Committee that night, and he therefore rose to call attention to the Papers laid on the table with reference to the Bank of Bombay, and to ask a Question thereupon. The Question was one of pressing importance, relating as it did to the existence of an institution in Bombay, which had a very great effect upon the state of public credit and credit generally in Bombay, and might indirectly seriously affect the credit of this country. In consequence of the failure of the Bank of Bombay, a new bank had been established, and the Government had established relations with it, resembling those which it had sustained with the late Bank. To this he should have felt no objection but for the extraordinary circumstance that all the evils that existed in the old Bank, and that led to its failure, had been re-created in the new Bank, which was to be supported by the Government of India. The old Bank was founded in 1840. It was established by an Act of the Legislative Council, which defined the powers and duties of the directors. The Court of Directors in England sent out instructions on which the Bank Act was passed; and they adopted this fundamental policy, that it was improper to give to a bank in India those unlimited powers which were given to similar institutions in this country; that no funds should be advanced, except on security, either of public loans of the Government of India, or merchandize, or bills of exchange having the security of an independent and solvent person in addition to the drawer and acceptor; and further, that no one should obtain upon his own credit loans exceeding £30,000. There was a further provision that the length of credit to be given should be limited to three months; and there was a strict prohibition against the funds being appropriated in any other manner. Under this admirable system the Bank was carried on for many years, and its credit stood higher than the credit of any bank in the world. Unfortunately, however, a change was made in the constitution of the Bank. A new law was passed empowering the directors to advance money on cash credit, and to buy and sell bills of exchange without those restrictions. Thus they were at liberty to advance what they pleased on the security of a single person, without any collateral security. Then began in Bombay an inflation of credit, before that time unknown; and when, on the failure of the Bank, the Government called for an explanation of the cause, a schedule was delivered, from which it was apparent that it arose from the changes which had been made. In that schedule he found this—Financial company, bill discounted £100,000, no security; fixed loan, £113,000, no security; a merchant, £50,000, cash credit, and no security. And those three items represented the character of the institution which had failed. In proposing the establishment of a new bank one would have expected that there would be an avoidance of the errors that had brought the old Bank to grief. But looking at the constitution of the new Bank he was surprised to find that there was precisely the same power given to invest funds without security that existed in the old Bank. Under these circumstances he was surprised to find that the Government of Bombay proposed to take shares in the Bank, and that the only security they proposed for their own protection was the appointment of an auditor or inspector, who would not be able to control any laches in the management of the business of the Bank as it proceeded from day to day. The reason assigned for the Government taking shares was, that persons of influence would not take shares unless the Government did so. On making inquiry who those persons of influence were, he was surprised to find that one distinguished member of the Council of the Governor General had applied for shares while these negotiations were pending, and that he threatened to withdraw his application unless matters were thus arranged to his satisfaction. Now, he had always thought the besetting sin of Indian administration was the tendency of its members to embark in joint-stock companies, but he did not expect to find this instance of it. He knew the gentleman in question to be a man of the highest sense of honour; but there were hundreds who would imitate his example for one that would imitate his motive, and in India people did not discriminate. He thought that the Government of India should merely watch over the accuracy of its own account, and that it should be made clear that the Government had no intention of securing either the public or the shareholders against loss. He wished, therefore, to know, what were the views of the Secretary of State for India on these points, and he ventured to suggest that—if it had not already been done—orders should be sent out to India directing and insisting on the constitution of the new Bank on the same principle as that which at its outset regulated the old Bank; that the powers of the directors should be regulated, not by a mere deed of incorporation, but by an Act of the Legislative Council, which should make it penal for the directors to misappropriate the funds of the institution.

MR. DYCE NICOL said: I will not detain the House beyond urging, in the strongest manner, on the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India the severing of the present connection between the Bombay Government and the Bank of Bombay, a continuance of which exposes the Government to a repetition of the difficulty in which they are now involved with the old Bank—calculated, as it is, to degrade the authority of the Government in India, and placing it in an entirely false position by assuming a responsibility before the public which, when called on to fulfil, it is under the necessity of repudiating. The present time appears, also, opportune for dissolving this commercial partnership. The community of Bombay have in a great measure recovered from the effects of their insane speculations, and have been the chief recipients of the millions expended in the Abyssinian expedition, while the chief article of export—namely, cotton—has, within the last few months, increased in value 100 per cent, there can be no longer any claim for the interposition of the Government credit in banking operations. I trust, therefore, that the right hon. Baronet will give early notice of the withdrawal of the Government from this co-partnership, and to intimate to the Banks of Bengal and Madras the intention of Government of adopting the same course with those institutions at the expiry of their present charters.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to explain to the hon. Member who last spoke that he (Sir Stafford Northcote) was in error when he told him the other day, in answer to a question, that the Act of 1863, which made an alteration of the charter of the Bombay Bank, had not been sent home before it was sanctioned. It had not been sent to the usual Department to which these dispatches came—he meant the Judicial Department; but he now found it had been sent to the Finance Department, and was therefore submitted to the Secretary of State before it was considered by the Legislative Council. With regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) he agreed with most of what the hon. Member had said; but he had to state that the Bank had only been temporarily constituted under articles of association which had been considered by the Home Government. The Secretary of State in Council had already sent a dispatch to Bombay pointing out that the articles of association were not satisfactory, and expressing a desire that an Act should pass, and that a draft of this Act should be sent home to the Secretary of State, in order that its details might be considered here before it was submitted to the Legislature of Bombay. When the draft came home it would be considered carefully, with a view to making it as perfect as possible. With respect to the question of the connection of the Government with banks, it was one on which his general opinion had in no way changed, but was rather strengthened by what had occurred. It was his opinion, as a general principle, that it was inexpedient for the Government to be shareholders in Presidency banks, and so rendered, to all appearance, responsible for their management. When the question of allowing the Government to take shares in the new Bank at Bombay came up for decision, he felt so strongly upon it that he overruled the opinions of a large majority of his Council, and sent out a despatch objecting to take shares. In the particular case of Bombay, however, he subsequently surrendered his own opinions upon finding that without the co-operation of the Government it would be impossible to re-establish the Bank, and that if it were not re-established great difficulties would arise and great injustice would be done to the mercantile community in Bombay. His assent, however, had been accompanied with this condition—that a Commission should inquire into the whole subject, and should examine whether the precautions taken were sufficient, or whether it was desirable that any other arrangements should be made. He hoped that by that inquiry some conclusions might be arrived at which would regulate the future relations between the Governor General of India and the Presidency banks generally. In the case to which reference had been made there would be no ground for comment or censure, either as to the spirit or intention of the distinguished person referred to. He was a shareholder in the old Bank of Bombay, and when the new Bank was proposed to be re-constituted, he made an application in the ordinary course for shares, under the impression that the Government were to be shareholders as before. Finding, however, that an objection was raised by the Secretary of State, he at once said that altered the position of affairs, and withdrew his application. There could be no doubt that both the application and the withdrawal were perfectly right; but it was equally true that this proceeding on the part of a person so exalted in position exercised an immense effect throughout a country like India. The question whether it was possible to lay down any rules forbidding Members of the Government or persons employed in Government Departments to hold shares in banks, he had discussed privately in letters with Sir John Lawrence and with members of his own Council; but it was exceedingly difficult to arrive at a decision as to putting limits to private investments; and he could only hope that the Report of the Commission would throw some light upon it. He did not commit himself to any positive opinion upon the point, but owned that he thought the present arrangement undesirable. Power would be given—probably had been given by this time—to the Commission to take evidence in India; and he had desired the Governor General to facilitate, if necessary, the adjournment of the Commission to England, though he did not expect that such a course would be necessary. Sir C. Jackson had sailed that day for Bombay, and had directions from him (Sir Stafford Northcote) to obtain power, if necessary, to carry on the inquiry without delay.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he did not intend to offer one word of hostile criticism upon what had been done by the right hon. Baronet. Not the least satisfactory part of his explanation was that in which he stated his views as to the undesirableness of the Government becoming shareholders in a bank. But there was one moral to be drawn from the case of the old Bank of Bombay which ought not to be overlooked—namely, the inefficiency and unreliable character of Government inspection and Government interference in commercial matters. Where there was Government inspection the public was always likely to cease to be vigilant or to contest the action of the directors; and then if anything went wrong they held the Government responsible for what really was the result of their own want of caution. It was very desirable, now that there was a constant demand for Government supervision and direction in a variety of ways, that from the recent occurrences in India a lesson should be drawn and that it should be impressed both upon the Government and the mercantile community. Anything more disastrous than this case of the Bank of Bombay he could hardly conceive, for it had covered the Government of Bombay with a kind of discredit, at the same time that the supervision of the Government had wholly failed to avert that ruin against which it was supposed to operate as a complete safeguard.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he thought it certain that the fact of a member of the Council of Government in India being connected with the management of a bank must give a great impulse to speculation. As matters stood in India, it appeared as if there were an irresponsible Council which was continually reversing the opinions of the Secretary of State and the House of Commons. He hoped that the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India would adopt effective measures to prevent a recurrence of the evils complained of. The right hon. Baronet had not distinctly stated that he had taken steps to prevent the possibility of a member of the Governor's Council becoming a shareholder.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

ARTIZANS' AND LABOURERS' DWELLINGS BILL.—[BILL 88.]

(Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens, Mr. Kinnaird, Mr. Locke.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens.)

MR. AYRTON said, that as the Bill stood persons who had no interest in the finances of the metropolis would be at liberty to impose burdens on the taxpayers. With a view of having this altered he moved the re-committal of the Bill.

Sir Stafford Northcote

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the words "Bill be" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "re-committed, for the purpose of amending the Schedule,"—(Mr. Ayrton),

—instead thereof.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, this was not a Government Bill, but last year the First Minister of the Crown stated that the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens), who introduced it, would have his sympathy. The question raised by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) was not a new one. The House, after a full discussion of the subject, had decided on adopting the area of the Metropolitan Board of Works. No sufficient reasons for re-considering that decision had been advanced either by the hon. Member or by the deputation that had waited that morning upon his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and his right hon. Friend was of opinion that there were no good grounds for re-committing the Bill.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he apprehended that the effect of the Bill would be to increase and not as was supposed to diminish the inequalities of taxation in the metropolis. The measure would impose a charge of 2*d.* in the pound for the purpose of carrying out objects which could be effected equally well without it. The vestries, and not the Board of Works which did not possess the confidence of the rate-payers, ought to be charged with carrying out the measure, and he would appeal to the hon. Member for Finsbury to agree to its being re-committed.

MR. MELLY, as representing a large constituency of 150,000 persons, objected to the re-committal of the Bill, which he hoped would be at once read a third time and passed.

COLONEL HOGG said, that the accusations made against the Metropolitan Board of Works were unfounded. The Board did not wish for additional responsibilities, although they would discharge to the best of their ability any fresh duties which Parliament might impose upon them.

MR. FAWCETT thought it was altogether too late to raise the objections made by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he felt that the metropolis had not had opportunity enough to consider this Bill. The Bill had been hurried through the House and therefore it ought to be re-committed.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Resolved, That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorised to raise any sum of money, not exceeding £800,000, by an issue of Exchequer Bonds.

2. Resolved, That the principal of all Exchequer Bonds which may be so issued shall be paid off at par at any period not exceeding five years from the date of such Bonds.

3. Resolved, That the interest of such Exchequer Bonds shall be payable half-yearly, and shall be charged upon and issued out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or the growing produce thereof.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next.
Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

* On Motion of Mr. CRAUFURD, Bill to amend the Acts relating to Weights and Measures in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CRAUFURD and Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 109.]

JURORS' AFFIRMATIONS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. CRAUFURD, Bill to give relief to Jurors who may refuse or be unwilling, from alleged conscientious motives, to be sworn in Civil or Criminal Proceedings in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. CRAUFURD and Mr. DUNLOP.
Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 110.]

CUSTOMS AND INCOME TAX BILL.

Bill "to grant certain Duties of Customs and Income Tax," presented, and read the first time. [Bill 108.]

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock, till Monday next.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES,

VOLUME CXCI.

SECOND VOLUME OF THE SESSION 1867-8.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

In Bills, Read 1<sup>o</sup>, 2<sup>o</sup>, 3<sup>o</sup>, or 1<sup>a</sup>, 2<sup>a</sup>, 3<sup>a</sup>, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negatived.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—R. P., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—l., Lords.—c., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

ABYSSINIAN EXPEDITION
Indian Estimate of Cost, Question, Mr. Fawcett; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote April 2, 703; April 23, 1148
Alleged Flogging of Mule Drivers, Question, Mr. Buxton; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote April 3, 834
Capture of Magdala, Question, Mr. Layard; Answer, Mr. Disraeli April 27, 1337

ACLAND, Mr. T. D., Devonshire, N.
 Army—Military Education, Res. 1837
 Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 185
 Supply—Volunteer Corps, 275, 280, 282
 Tancred's Charity, 2R. 235

ADDERLEY, Right Hon. C. B. (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), Staffordshire, N.
 Ceylon—Condition of, Motion for a Committee, 975, 976, 978
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1475
 Mauritius—Fever at the, 660, 661
 Passenger Acts, 1575
 Queensland—Polynesian Labourers, 1882
 Victoria—Case of the Convict Millar, 1576
VOL. CXCI. [THIRD SERIES.]

ADVOCATE, The Lord (Right Hon. E. S. Gordon), Thetford
 Canongate Annuity Tax, 2R. Amendt. 1001, 1096
 Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. add. cl. 1063
 Registration of Writs (Scotland), 2R. 100
 Scotland—Questions, &c.
     Education, 2002
     Established Church, 1884
     Roads, 357
     Trawling for Herrings, 1882

AGAR-ELLIS, Hon. L. G. F., Kilkenny Co.
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1369

AIRLIE, Earl of Education, 2R. Amendt. 1305, 1331
 Poor Relief, Comm. 464
 Scotland—Poor Assessment, Motion for Returns, 328

AKROYD, Mr. E., Halifax
 Spain and Prussia, Treaty of Commerce, 1147

ALLEN, Mr. W. S., Newcastle-under-Lyme
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1376

ANSON, Hon. Major A. H. A., Lichfield
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 94
 Colliers in the Wigan District, Strike of, 1224
 India—Case of Sir T. J. Metcalfe, Motion for a
 Committee, 1268, 1278, 1280
 Supply—Works, Buildings, &c. 285, 291

ANSTRUTHER, Sir R., Fifeshire
 Passenger Steamers, Overloading of, 450
 Supply—Volunteer Corps, 277

ARGYLL, Duke of
 Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 806, 813, 819
 Education, 2R. 1314
 Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1448, 1453
 Victoria—Appropriation Act, 1974, 1976, 1977

ARMSTRONG, Mr. Serjeant R., Sligo Bo.
 Bankruptcy (Ireland), 830
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 623

Army

Ball Cartridges to Soldiers in Barracks, Question, Mr. Hayter; Answer, Sir John
 Pakington May 8, 2002

Commissions, Question, Sir Thomas Lloyd;
 Answer, Sir John Pakington Mar 27, 358

Cooking Apparatus—Captain Warrens' Question,
 Colonel Sykes; Answer, Sir John Pakington
Mar 26, 257—Messrs. Jeakes', Question,
 Mr. Thomson Hankey; Answer, Sir
 John Pakington Mar 30, 468

Daily Payment of Men, Question, Colonel W.
 Stuart; Answer, Sir John Pakington Mar 20, 263

Fever at the Mauritius—Mortality in the 86th Regiment, Question, Mr. Otway; Answer,
 Sir John Pakington Mar 23, 37; Mar 27,
 360; Questions, Mr. Barclay, Mr. Whalley;
 Answers, Mr. Adderley April 1, 660; Question,
 Mr. Whalley; Answer, Sir John Pakington
April 28, 1460; Question, Colonel
 North; Answer, Sir John Pakington May 7, 1883

Fortifications—Treasury Minute, Aug. 16, 1867, Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Mr.
 Selater-Booth Mar 26, 260

Fortifications—Committee on Coast Defences, Question, Mr. O'Beirne; Answer, Sir John
 Pakington April 28, 1456

Officers holding Civil Appointments, Question,
 Mr. White; Answer, Sir John Pakington
April 27, 1333

Promotions in the Coldstream Guards, Question,
 Sir Patrick O'Brien; Answer, Sir
 John Pakington April 30, 1579; May 7, 1883

Reserve Forces—Militia Regulations, Question,
 The Marquess of Hartington; Answer, Sir
 John Pakington May 5, 1787

Woolwich Arsenal—Repair of Machinery, Question, Captain Pack-Beresford; Answer,
 Sir John Pakington April 28, 1455

Army—Administration of the

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 8, To leave out from "That" and add "in the opinion of this House, it would be advan-

[cont.]

Army—Administration of the—cont.

tageous and convenient to substitute a system of weekly in lieu of daily payments to those non-commissioned Officers and Soldiers of the Army whose previous conduct might warrant the extension of this indulgence"
 (Mr. Percy Wyndham), 2003; Question,
 "That the words, &c.;" after short debate,
 Amendt. withdrawn

Army—Fortifications—Dockyards and Naval Arsenals

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 8, To leave out from "That" and add "two Members of this House and another Civil Engineer should be added to the Committee appointed to consider the question of the Fortifications for the defence of the United Kingdom and of the Colonies, and that arrangements shall be made to stop, as far as possible, all further outlay until that Committee shall have reported to this House" (Mr. O'Beirne), 2021; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Another Amendt. To leave out from "That"
 and add "in the opinion of this House,
 no further outlay on the Fortifications for the defence of the United Kingdom and of the Colonies, except such as may be absolutely necessary under existing Contracts, or to complete works which cannot be suspended without serious inconvenience, ought to be incurred until the Report of the Committee recently appointed shall have been laid before this House" (Mr. Childers), 2049; Question, "That the words, &c.;"
 A. 93, N. 48; M. 45

Army—Military Education

Resolution for Address, "Praying that a Royal Commission composed of Military and Civilian Members be appointed to inquire into the present state of Military Education in this Country, and more especially into the training of Candidates for Commissions in the Army, and into the constitution, system of Education, and discipline of the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, and of the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, as well as into the rules and regulations under which Candidates are admitted into those Colleges" (Lord Eustace Cecil) May 5, 1819; after short debate,
 Motion agreed to

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Bill

(Mr. McCullagh Torrens, Mr. Kinnaird,
Mr. Locke)

a. Committee—r.p. April 1, 672 [Bill 1]
 Committee; Report April 21, 1063 [Bill 88] Considered as amended April 29, 1564; after short debate, Debate adjourned
 Adjourned Debate on Question [29th April],
 "That the Clause (Act not to apply to cases in which freeholder has successfully instituted proceedings and carries out necessary repairs)
 (Sir Francis Goldsmid) be now read 2<sup>o</sup>"
May 6, 1875; after short debate, Motion and clause withdrawn

[cont.]

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Bill—cont.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>d</sup>" (Mr. McCullagh Torrens) May 8, 2060

Amendt. to leave out from "Bill be" and add "re-committed, for the purpose of amending the Schedule" (Mr. Ayrton); after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to; Bill read 3<sup>d</sup>

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir J. B. Karslake), Andorer

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Consid. 1565

Bankruptcy Law, 268

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, Comm. 1198; cl. 1, 1201

Libel, 2R. 665

Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites), 2R. 663

AYRTON, Mr. A. S., Tower Hamlets

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 75

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 6, 674; cl. 28, 678; add. cl. 1064, 1065;

Schedule, Amendt. 1066; Consid. Motion for Adjournment, 1565, 1567, 1569, 1875; Amendt. 1876, 1877, 1878; 3R. 2060

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, Comm. 1197

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. 316, 321

Electric Telegraphs, 706

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1419, 1420; Res. 1906, 1907, 1927

India—Bank of Bombay, 430, 2055

Libel, 2R. 666

London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance, Comm. 200; cl. 2, Amendt. 202, 204; add. cl. 205; Consid. add. cl. 326, 327

Marine Mutiny, Comm. 559

Ministerial Statement, 1724, 1746, 1801

Parliament—Business of the House, 1680

Post Horse and Carriage Licences Duties, Motion for a Committee, 194

Supply—British Embassy Houses, 990, 993

Royal Palaces, 1009, 1010, 1011, 1013; Volunteer Corps, 272

Supply—Proceedings in — Resolution, 1025, 1466

AYTOUN, Mr. R. Sinclair, Kirkcaldy

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 76

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1902, 1916, 1924

Passenger Steamers, Overloading of, 450

Supply—British Embassy Houses, 987

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1178

BAGNALL, Mr. C., Whitby

Coble, Mr., Case of, 1457

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1869

Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 168

BAGWELL, Mr. J., Clonmel

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1942

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 211

Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 221; Amendt. 223

Ireland—Habeas Corpus Act, 1784

BAINES, Mr. E., Leeds

Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 166

Bank Holidays Bill

(Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Mr. Stacpoole)

c. Select Committee nominated; List of the Committee April 23, 1216

Bankruptcy Bill [H.L.] (The Lord Chancellor)

l. Read 2<sup>d</sup> Mar 23 (No. 31-75)

Question, Lord Chelmsford; Answer, The Lord Chancellor April 3, 802

Committee; Report; Bill re-committed April 24

Bankruptcy Acts Repeal Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>d</sup>" (The Lord Chancellor) Mar 23, 1; after debate, Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> (No. 30)

Committee; Report April 24, 1217 (No. 74)

Bill re-committed

Bankruptcy Law

Observations, Mr. Moffatt; Reply, The Attorney General Mar 26, 265

BARCLAY, Mr. A. C., Taunton

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 93

Mauritius—Fever at the, 660

BARING, Mr. T., Huntingdon

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1176

BARROW, Mr. W. H., Nottinghamshire, S.

Commissions, Permanent Expenses of, Res. 1204

County Financial Boards, 2R. 1552

BARRY, Mr. Serjeant C. R., Dungarran

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1956

BARTHELOT, Colonel W. B., Sussex, IV.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Benefice of Kilpec, 701

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 1418; Res. 1, 1466

Supply—Volunteer Corps, 268

BASS, Mr. M. T., Derby

Licences, Res. 155, 158

BATESON, Sir T., Dorizes

Ireland—Presbytery of Antrim, 1581

BATH, Marquess of

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1141

Parliament—Business of the House, Report, 568

BAXTER, Mr. W. E., Montrose, &c.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1608

BAZLEY, Mr. T., Manchester

Army—Fortifications, Res. 2051
Cotton Statistics, 2R. 1874
Railways, Revision of, 35
Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 167, 180

BEACH, Sir M. E. Hicks, (Secretary to the Poor Law Commissioners), Gloucestershire, E.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1,
Motion for Adjournment, 1534, 1584
Poor Law—Gravescend Board of Guardians, 704
Rogers, Dr., Medical Officer of the Strand Union, 262

BEAUMONT, Mr. Wentworth B., Northumberland, S.

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1872

Belgium, Riots in

Question, Mr. Grant; Answer, Lord Stanley April 3, 837

BENTINCK, Mr. G. Cavendish, Whitehaven

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, 2R. 327; Comm. Amendt. 1195; cl. 1, 1200
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1379
Supply—Royal Palaces, 1005, 1009
Tancred's Charity, 2R. 229
United States—The "Springbok," 2002

BERESFORD, Capt. D. W. Pack-, Carlow Co.

Army—Woolwich Arsenal, 1455

BERKELEY, Hon. F. H. F., Bristol

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. 302

Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes

Bill [H.L.] (The Marquess of Clanricarde)

1. Presented; read 1st April 2 (No. 65)

BLAKE, Mr. J. A., Waterford City

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 211
Ireland—Searching Suspicious Persons, 468

Board of Trade

Compulsory Pilotage, Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 27, To leave out from "That," and add "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, representing that, in the opinion of this House, measures ought to be taken for the early abolition of Compulsory Pilotage, with due regard to existing interests, and for requiring Pilotage Authorities to examine and license all competent persons applying to them for the purpose of qualifying to act as pilots" (Mr. Candlish), 361; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn
Merchant Shipping Consolidation Bill, Question, Mr. Graves; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave April 2, 699
Overloading of Passenger Steamers, Question, Mr. Sinclair Aytoun; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave Mar 27, 450

[cont.]

Board of Trade—cont.

Passenger Acts—Foreign Transatlantic Steamers, Question, Mr. Graves; Answer, Mr. Adderley April 30, 1574

Private Bills—Board of Trade Reports, Question, Mr. Waldegrave-Lealie; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave April 3, 831

Rule of the Road at Sea, Question, Mr. Holland; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave April 2, 705

BONHAM-CARTER, Mr. J., Winchester

Supply—Harbours of Refuge, 1002

Boroughs and Divisions of Counties

Bill—Afterwards

Boundary Bill

(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy) Mar 24, 186; Bill ordered

Read 1st Mar 26 [Bill 78]

Question, Mr. Watkin; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy April 2, 706

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2nd" (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) April 20, 1014

After short debate, Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee); Motion withdrawn; main Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 2nd

Question, Mr. Hibbert; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 5, 1786

Boundary Commission—Assistant Boundary Commissioners' Reports

Questions, Mr. Serjeant Gaselee, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answers, Mr. Disraeli Mar 24, 146

BOUVERIE, Rt. Hon. E. P., Kilmarnock, &c.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, 2R. 327; Comm. 1199

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. 313

Marine Mutiny, Consid. 573

Ministerial Statement, 1726

Mutiny, 3R. 571

Representation of the People (Scotland), 1885

Roman Catholic Oath, 1682

BOWYER, Sir G., Dundalk

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. 301

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1422, 1424

India—Case of Sir T. J. Metcalfe, Motion for a Committee, 1280

Licences, Res. 159

London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Comm. add. cl. 205

Ministerial Statement, 1745

Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), Leave, 1863

Parliament—Business of the House, 1680

Peerage (Ireland), 2R. 1564

Supply—British Embassy Houses, 987

Royal Palaces, 1010, 1012

Volunteer Corps, 277

BRADY, Mr. J., Leitrim Co.

Ireland—Imprisonment of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott, 449

"Oliver Twist," Play of, 834

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1957

Brazil, War in—Mediation

Question, Mr. Horsman; Answer, Lord Stanley Mar 27, 359

BRETT, Sir H. B., see Solicitor General, The

BRIGHT, Mr. John, Birmingham

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 645, 720, 769; Res. 1, 1649, 1908, 1932, 1941

Ministerial Statement, 1730, 1746, 1794

Bristol, Representation of

Question, Mr. Neville-Grenville; Answer, Mr. Powell Mar 27, 359

BROMLEY, Mr. W. DAVENPORT—Warwickshire, N.

County Financial Boards, 2R. 1558

Broughty Ferry Provisional Order Confirmation Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Bill ordered * April 21

Read 1<sup>o</sup> * April 22

[Bill 90]

Read 2<sup>o</sup> * April 23

Committee *; Report April 27

Read 3<sup>o</sup> * April 28

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> * (The Lord Clinton) April 30 (No. 86)

Read 2<sup>o</sup> * May 8

BRUCE, Rt. Hon. H. A., Merthyr Tydfil
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Consid. 1567

Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1080

County Financial Boards, 2R. 1550

Education, Technical—Mr. Whitworth's Endowment, 699

Infectious Diseases, Motion for an Address, 2011

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1868

Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 180, 181

Tancred's Charity, 2R. 234

BRUCE, Sir H. H., Coleraine

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 616

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 210

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1957

BRUN, Mr. H., Carlow Co.

India—Bonus Committee, The, 261

BUCKINGHAM, Duke of (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

Canada—Assassination of Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee, 1109

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1113

Parliament—Business of the House, 1682

Victoria—Appropriation Act, 1967, 1976, 1977

BULLER, Sir E. M., Staffordshire, N.

Registration of Electors, 1458

Burials (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Monsell, Mr. Sullivan)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Monsell) April 22, 1067

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Colonel William Stuart); Question, "That 'now,' &c.:" A. 74, N. 51; M. 23; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> [Bill 5]

Burials (Ireland) Bill—Mr. Monsell and the Dean of Cork

Explanation, Mr. Monsell April 28, 1454

BUXTON, Sir T. F., King's Lynn

Slave Trade—Zanzibar, 1578

Supply—Volunteer Corps, 283

BUXTON, Mr. C., Surrey, E.

Army—Alleged Flogging of Mule Drivers in Abyssinia, 834

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. 1039

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1470

CAIRNS, Lord (see CHANCELLOR, The Lord)

CAMBRIDGE, Duke of (Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief)

Marine Mutiny, 2R. 683

CAMPBELL, Lord

Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 803

Canada—Assassination of Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee

Question, The Earl of Carnarvon; Answer, The Duke of Buckingham April 23, 1108

CANDLISH, Mr. J., Sunderland

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 8, Amendt. 675; cl. 11, ib.; cl. 14, Amendt. ib., 676; Consid. 1567; Schedule, 1877

Boundary, 2R. 1014

Canongate Annuity Tax, 2R. 1098

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 4, 1060

Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 223, 223

London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance, Comm. Amendt 196

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1869

Pilotage, Compulsory, Res. 361, 373, 387

Supply—British Embassy Houses, 996

Harbours of Refuge, 1000, 1002

Works, Buildings, &c. 296

Canongate Annuity Tax Bill

(Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Barter)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. M'Laren) April 22, 1087

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (The Lord Advocate); after debate, Question, "That 'now' &c.:" A. 59, N. 86; M. 27; Division List, Ayes and Noes, 1107

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to; Bill put off for six months

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1123
Education, 2R. 1309

Capital Punishment within Prisons Bill
(Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Attorney General)

c. Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" April 21, 1033

Amendt. to leave out from "That" and add "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient, instead of carrying out the punishment of death within prisons, that Capital Punishment should be abolished" (Mr. Gilpin); after debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," A. 127, N. 23; M. 104

Main Question put, and agreed to; Committee; Report, 1055

Considered as amended * April 27

Read 3* April 28

[Bill 36]

l. Read 1* (The Duke of Richmond) April 30

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2*" (The Duke of Richmond) May 7, 1879; after short debate, Bill read 2* (No. 83)
Committee*; Report May 8

CARDWELL, Right Hon. E., Oxford City
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 93
Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, 1200

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 888

Ministerial Statement, 1745, 1799

Parliament—Business of the House, 1680

CARLISLE, Bishop of
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1141

CARNARVON, Earl of
Canada—Assassination of Mr. D'Arcy M'Gee, 1108

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1127
Parliament—Business of the House, Report, 562; Res. 695

Victoria—Appropriation Act, 1979

CARTER, Mr. S., Coventry
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 622

Cattle Plague

Question, Mr. Read; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu April 30, 1878

Importation of Foreign Cattle, Observations, Lord Robert Montagu; Reply, Mr. Horsfall April 23, 1149

CAVE, Rt. Hon. S. (Paymaster of the Forces and Vice President of the Board of Trade), New Shoreham
Board of Trade—Private Bills, 881
Carriage of Parcels by Railway, 1333, 1384
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1604

Merchant Shipping Consolidation, 699

Passenger Steamers, Overloading of, 451

Pilotage, Compulsory, Res. 371

Private Bill Legislation—Standing Order 131
Repeal, 143; Explanation, 351, 356

[cont.]

CAVE, Right Hon. S.—cont.

Railway and Joint Stock Companies Accounts, 2R. 1539

Railways (Guards' and Passengers' Communication), 2R. 206

Rule of the Road at Sea, 705

Supply—Harbours of Refuge, 1000

Lighthouses Abroad, 1003, 1004

Thames River, Obstructions in the, 1577

CAVENISH, Lord E., Sussex, E.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1611

CAVENDISH, Lord G. H., Derbyshire, N.

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1869

Turnpike Trusts, Motion for an Address, 2017

CECIL, Lord E. H. B. G., Essex, S.

Army—Military Education, Res. 1819

Weights and Measures, False, Commission on, 467

Ceylon—Condition of

Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 20, To leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the condition of Ceylon and the action of its Government" (Mr. Watkin), 971; after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to

CHAMBERS, Mr. M., Devonport

Army—Military Education, Res. 1836

Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1082

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 3, 1058; cl. 4, 1061

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, 2R. 1874

CHAMBERS, Mr. T., Marylebone

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 6, 673; cl. 35, Amendt. 678

CHANCELLOR, The LORD (LORD CAIRNS)

Bankruptcy Acts Repeal, 2R. 1, 30, 803; Comm. 1217, 1219, 1220

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1136

Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, Motion for a Committee, 252

Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1446

Ministerial Statement, 1687, 1689

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 692

United States—The "Alabama" Claims, Motion for Papers, 342, 349

Victoria—Appropriation Act, 1937, 1994, 2000

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Right Hon. G. W. Hunt), Northamptonshire, N.

Commissions, Permanent Expenses of, Res. 1294

Court of Chancery—Salaries and Expenses, 709

Electric Telegraphs, Leave, 678, 681, 706

Licences, Res. 153

Parliament—Business of the House, 1680

Post Horse and Carriage Licences Duties, Motion for a Committee, 194

[cont.]

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER—cont.

- Supply—British Embassy Houses, 988, 990, 994, 996
 Harbours of Refuge, 1002
 Mission House, Teheran, 999
 Royal Palaces, 1011
 Supply—Proceedings in—Resolution, 1029, 1031, 1464
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1149, 1173, 1190; Comm. Res. 1, 1751, 1770, 1772; Res. 2, 1774

Charitable Institutions, Taxation of

- Question, Mr. Hadfield; Answer, Mr. Disraeli
May 4, 1893

CHELMSFORD, Lord

- Bankruptcy Acts Repeal, 2R. 26, 802, 803
 Parliament—Business of the House, Res. Amendt. 696

CHILDERS, Mr. H. O. E., Pontefract

- Army Estimates—Land Forces, 77, 79
 Army—Fortifications, Res. 2047
 Ceylon—Condition of, Motion for a Committee, 979
 Civil Service Estimates, 830
 Commissions, Permanent Expenses of, Res. 1284
 Court of Chancery—Salaries and Expenses, 700
 Land Writs Registration (Scotland) Fees, 880
 Middlesex Registry Office, 1146
 Ministerial Statement, 1726
 Mutiny, Comm. cl. 67, 325
 Navy Estimates, 147
 Parliament—Business of the House, 1681
 Post Office—Case of A. J. Duffy, Motion for a Committee, 1298
 Supply—British Embassy Houses, 989, 991, 992, 994, 996
 Harbours of Refuge, 1001
 Lighthouses Abroad, 1003
 Mission House, Teheran, 999
 Royal Palaces, 1004, 1006
 Works, Buildings, &c. 286, 292, 294, 295
 Supply—Proceedings in—Resolution, 1030, 1031
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1182; Comm. Res. 1, 1767, 1769

China—Treaty of Tien-tsin

- Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Lord Stanley
April 23, 1147

Cholera in the Mediterranean

- Question, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise; Answer, Lord Stanley
April 2, 703

Church Rates Commutation Bill

(Mr. Newdegate, Colonel Stuart)

- c.* Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Newdegate) April 29, 1535; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of

- Brecon and Neath Railway—Accident on the, 1879, 1881
 Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, Motion for a Committee, 248, 250
 Parliament—Business of the House, Report, 569; Res. 693, 694
 Public Petitions, Motion for a Select Committee, 690

CLAY, Mr. J., Kingston-on-Hull

- Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1923

CLEVELAND, Duke of

- Parliament—Business of the House, Report, 599; Res. 692

CLIVE, Mr. G., Hereford City

- County Financial Boards, 2R. 1552
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 752
 Turnpike Trusts, Motion for an Address, 3012

Coble, Mr., Case of

- Question, Mr. Bagnall; Answer, Mr. Solater
Booth April 28, 1457

COCHRANE, Mr. A. D. R. W. Baillie, Honiton

- Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 1248, 1255
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 519
 "St. Abbe," Survivors of the, 260

COGAN, Right Hon. W. H. F., Kildare Co.

- Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1920

COLCHESTER, Lord

- Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1131

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire

- Supply—Volunteer Corps, 274

COLERIDGE, Mr. J. D., Exeter

- Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 797, 837, 850

COLLIER, Sir R. P., Plymouth

- India—Civilian Judges (Bombay), 1460
 Libel, 2R. 664
 Ministerial Statement, 1741

Colliers in the Wigan District, Strike of

- Question, Major Anson; Answer, Sir James Fergusson
April 24, 1224

Colliery Accidents

- Observations, Mr. Greene
April 28, 1464

Commissions, Permanent Expenses of

- Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 24,
 To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the expenses of the Copyhold, Inclosure, and Tithe Commission, Inclosure and Drainage Acts, and Charity Commission, ought not to be borne by the public" (Mr. Goldney), 1280; after debate, Question, "That the words, &c.;" A. 104, N. 105; M. 1; Question, "That those words be there added;" A. 106, N. 105; M. 1; words added; main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition Bill (Mr. Gladstone, Sir G. Grey, Sir R. Palmer)

c. Question, Mr. Newdegate; Answer, Mr. Gladstone Mar 23, 39

Third Reading deferred, after short debate Mar 23, 101

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Gladstone) Mar 24, 208

After short debate, Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Newdegate) put, and negatived; Question again proposed

Moved, "That the debate be now adjourned" (Mr. Schreiber); A. 28, N. 131; M. 103

After further short debate, original Question put, and agreed to; Bill read 3<sup>o</sup> [Bill 72]

l. Presented (The Earl Russell); read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 26

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Earl Russell) April 23, 1108; after debate, Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> (No. 55)

Statement (Earl Russell) April 24, 1217

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill" (Earl Russell) April 30, 1870

After short debate, Motion withdrawn; Bill referred to a Select Committee

And, on May 1, Committee nominated; List of the Committee, 1874

CONOLLY, Mr. T., Donegal Co.

Ministerial Statement, 1712; Motion for Adjournment, 1717, 1719

Consecration and Ordination Fees

Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth April 27, 1332

Consolidated Fund (£362,398 19s. 9d.) Bill

c. Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 23

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 24

Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 26

Committee*; Report Mar 27

Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 28

Royal Assent Mar 30 [31 Vict. c. 10]

Consolidated Fund (£8,000,000) Bill

c. Read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 24

Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 25

Committee*; Report Mar 26

Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 27

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 30

Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 31

Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 2

Royal Assent April 3 [31 Vict. c. 13]

Consolidated Fund (£1,000,000) Bill

c. Ordered* May 6

CORK, Earl of

Sea Fisheries, 2R. 466

Corporation of London Bill

(Mr. Mill, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Tomlins, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Layard)

c. Ordered* May 5

CORRANCE, Mr. F. S., Suffolk, E.

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1870

CORRY, Right Hon. H. T. L. (First Lord of the Admiralty), Tyrone Co.

India—Telegraphic Communication, 1459

Marine Mutiny, 2R. 99

Navy—Flogging on board the "Favourite," 37; —Retired Officers, 1693

Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 1, 1760, 1763

Cotton Statistics Bill

(Mr. Bazley, Mr. Milner Gibson, Mr. Horsfall, Mr. Watkin, Mr. Cheetham)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 27 [Bill 96]

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Bazley) May 6, 1874; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>

County Courts (Admiralty Jurisdiction) Bill

(Mr. Norwood, Mr. Headlam, Mr. Candlish)

c. Committee*; Report April 24 [Bills 33-94]

County Financial Arrangements

Question, Sir William Galloway; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy May 4, 1694

County Financial Boards (No. 2) Bill

(Mr. Wyld, Mr. Hodgkinson)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Wyld) April 29, 1542 [Bill 52]

Amend. to leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present mode of conducting the Financial Arrangements of the Counties in England and Wales, and whether any alteration ought to be made either in the persons by whom or the manner in which such arrangements are now conducted" (The Judge Advocate) April 29, 1558; after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.;" A. 46, N. 154; M. 108; words added

Ordered, That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present mode of conducting the Financial Arrangements of the Counties in England and Wales, and whether any alteration ought to be made either in the persons by whom or the manner in which such arrangements are now conducted (The Judge Advocate)

Committee nominated May 11; List of Committee—see page 93, vol. cxcii

County General Assessment (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 2 [Bill 84]

Court of Appeal Chancery (Despatch of Business) Amendment Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord St. Leonards)

c. Committee*; Report Mar 24 [Bill 68]

Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 26

l. Royal Assent Mar 30 [31 Vict. c. 12]

Court of Chancery—Salaries and Expenses

Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer April 2, 700

COWPER, Earl
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 696

COWPER, Right Hon. W. F., Hertford
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1601
London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance, Comm. cl. 2, 202
Metropolis—Burlington House, 467

CRANBORNE, Right Hon. Viscount, (See also SALISBURY, Marquess of) Stamford
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 532, 708
India—Systems of Government, 424
Tancred's Charity, 2R. 230, 231

CRANWORTH, Lord
Bankruptcy Acts Repeal, Comm. 1218
Capital Punishment within Prisons, 2R. 1879

CRAUFURD, Mr. E. H. J., Ayr, &c.
Canongate Annuity Tax, 2R. 1106
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 321
Representation of the People (Scotland), 829, 2005

CRAWFORD, Mr. R. W., London
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Consid. Schedule, 1877
London Coal and Wine Duties, Consid. add. cl. 327
Ministerial Statement, 1723, 1818
Postal—Eastern Mail Service, 258

Criminal Law

Clerkenwell Explosion—The Convict Barrett, Question, Mr. Reardon; Answer, Mr. G. Hardy April 3, 1579
Devises Gael, Question, Mr. Marsh; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy April 28, 1455
Featherstonhaugh, Mr., Murder of, Question, Mr. Eykyn; Answer, The Earl of Mayo April 28, 1459
Johnston, Mr., Case of, Question, Colonel Forde; Answer, The Earl of Mayo Mar 30, 469
Military Prisons, Question, Mr. D. Griffith; Answer, Sir John Pakington Mar 23, 38
Millar, The Convict (Victoria), Question, Mr. Hurst; Answer, Mr. Adderley April 30, 1576

(See Ireland)

Customs and Income Tax Bill
c. Read 1st May 8 [Bill 108]

Customs Officers, Grievances of — Report of Commission
Question, Mr. Graves; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth April 28, 1455

DALGLISH, Mr. R., Glasgow
Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 1, 1766
VOL. CXCI. [THIRD SERIES.]

DAWSON, Mr. R. Peel, Londonderry Co.
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 605
Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. 217
Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1952

DE GREY AND RIPON, Earl
Marine Mutiny, 2R. 687
Parliament—Business of the House, Report, 567

DENBIGH, Earl of
Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 813

DENISON, Right Hon. J. E., see SPEAKER, The

DENMAN, Hon. G., Tiverton
Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 3, 1057; cl. 4, 1061
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1496
Mines Assessment, 2R. 1868

DENT, Mr. J. D., Scarborough
Supply—Volunteer Corps, 272
Tancred's Charity, 2R. 231

DERBY, Earl of
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1124
Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1303, 1425, 1434, 1437, 1446

DEVON, Earl of (Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law Board)
Poor Relief, 2R. 138; Comm. 457
Scotland—Poor Assessment, Motion for Returns, 332

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1257
Supply—Volunteer Corps, 277
Royal Palaces, 1008

DIMSDALE, Mr. R., Hertford
India—Retirement of Field Officers of the Indian Army, 830

DISRAELI, Right Hon. B. (First Lord of the Treasury) Buckinghamshire
Abyssinian Expedition, 1337
Boundary Commission, 146
British Museum, 398
Charitable Institutions, Taxation of, 1693
Civil Service Estimates, 830
Compound Householder, The, 1785
Edinburgh, Duke of, Address to Her Majesty, 1334
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 321, 703
Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 33, 35
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 603, 797, 893, 920, 931, 1418, 1420, 1462; Res. 1, 1667, 1679; Res. 3, 1901, 1929, 1936, 1940, 1941, 1946

DISRAELI, Right Hon. B.—cont.

Member for Thetford—Titles of Dignity, 832
 Ministerial Statement, 826, 1694, 1711, 1742,
 1745, 1746, 1793, 1794, 1814, 1819
 Parliament—Arrangement of Business, 264 ;
 —Easter Recess, 836
 Registration of Electors, 1458
 Representation of the People (Scotland), 829, 1885, 2005
 Roman Catholic Oath, 1582
 Supply—Proceedings in—Resolution, 1032

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court Bill

(Mr. C. Forster, Mr. Headlam, Mr. Karlake)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2°" (Mr. C. Forster) May 6, 1873 ; after short debate, Bill read 2° [Bill 50]

DIXON, Mr. G., Birmingham

Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 165

Documentary Evidence Bill

(Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary G. Hardy)

c. Ordered ; read 1° April 27 [Bill 97]
 Read 2° April 30
 Committee ; Report May 7
 Read 3° May 8

DODSON, Mr. J. G. (Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means), Sussex, E.
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1400 ;
 Res. 1908, 1913, 1924, 1925, 1931
 Private Bill Legislation—Standing Order No.
 131 Repeal, 139
 Supply—British Embassy Houses, 984
 Royal Palaces, 1007, 1009, 1012

DUNNE, Major-Gen. F. P., Queen's Co.
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 71
 Ireland—Duty on Spirit Licences, 38

DYKE, Mr. W. Hart, Kent, W.
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1354

East India Civil Service

Moved, "That this House, whilst cordially approving of the system of open competition for appointments in the East India Civil Service, is of opinion that the people of India have not a fair chance of competing for these appointments as long as the examinations are held nowhere but in London ; this House would therefore deem it desirable that, simultaneously with the examination in London, the same examination should be held in Calcutta, Bombay and Madras" (Mr. Fawcett) May 5, 1838

Amendt. to leave out from "open competition," and add "as regards the appointment of untried young men to the East India Civil Service, is of opinion that natives of India who have proved in the Uncovenanted Service or otherwise their superior fitness for situations at present held exclusively by Members in the Covenanted Service should be appointed to them without undergoing a competing examination" (Mr. Trevelyan) ; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. and Motion withdrawn

[cont.]

East India Civil Service—cont.

Ecclesiastical Buildings and Glebes (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir Graham Montgomery)

c. Read 2° April 20 [Bill 58]

Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Benefice of Kilpec, Hereford

Question, Colonel Barttelot ; Answer, Mr. Mowbray April 2, 701

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council Bill [H.L.] (The Lord Chancellor)

c. Read 2°, after short debate Mar 26, 327
 Order for Committee read ; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) April 23, 1194
 Amendt. to leave out from "That" and add "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr. Bentinck) ; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Main Question put, and agreed to
 Committee ; Report April 23

Read 3° April 24 [Bill 69]
 Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 19]

Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Operation of any Law or Laws as to the Assumption of Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland ; and whether any and what Alteration should be made therein" (Earl Stanhope) Mar 26, 239 ; after debate, Motion agreed to List of the Committee, 255

Edinburgh, His Royal Highness the Duke of

Resolved, after short debate, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, to convey to Her Majesty the expression of the sorrow and indignation with which this House has learned the atrocious Attempt to assassinate His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh while on a Visit to Her Majesty's loyal Australian Colonies, and of their heartfelt Congratulations to Her Majesty on his Preservation from mortal Injury ; and to assure Her Majesty of the Sympathy of this House in Her Majesty's present Anxiety, and of their earnest Hope for the speedy Recovery of His Royal Highness" (The Earl of Malmesbury) April 27, 1304

The Queen's Answer reported May 1, 1682

Resolved, after short debate, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, &c." (Mr. Disraeli) April 27, 1334
 Her Majesty's Answer reported May 4, 1694

Education

British Museum—South Kensington Museum, Observations, Mr. Gregory, Mr. Beresford Hope; Reply, Mr. Disraeli Mar 27, 388

Endowed Grammar Schools, Question, Lord Taunton; Answer, The Duke of Marlborough May 8, 1782

Paris Universal Exhibition, 1867—Payments, Question, Mr. Bayley Potter; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu Mar 27, 356

Scientific Instruction, Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the provisions for giving instruction in theoretical and applied Science to the Industrial Classes" (Mr. Samuelson) Mar 24, 160; after debate, Motion agreed to; List of the Committee, 186

Scotland—Education Bill, Question, Admiral Erskine; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 8, 2001

Technical Education—The Whitworth Scholarships, Question, Mr. Bruce; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu April 2, 699; Observations, Earl Granville; Reply, The Duke of Marlborough April 3, 820

(See Army—Military Education)

Education Bill [H.L.] (The Lord President)

1. Presented; after debate, read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 24, 103
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>" (The Lord President) April 27, 1305

Amendt. to leave out ("now,") and insert ("this Day Three Months") (The Earl of Airlie); after debate, Amendt. withdrawn; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (No. 53)

EDWARDS, Sir H., Beverley
Ministerial Statement, 1810

Ejectments Suspension (Ireland) Bill
(Mr. Kennedy, Mr. Serjeant Armstrong)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 29 [Bill 100]

ELCHO, Lord, Haddingtonshire

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 67, 97

Army—Fortifications, Res 2042, 2049

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1643, 1649

Mutiny, Consid. Amendt. 557

Supply—Volunteer Corps, 273, 281, 282

Works, Buildings, &c. 287

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir Stafford Northcote)

c. Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Spenser do now leave the Chair" Mar 26, 296

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House, while earnestly desiring to provide the best tribunal for the trial of Controverted Elections, to reduce the cost of such trials, and to ensure the detection and punishment of bribery and corruption, is not prepared to assent to any measure which aims at the destruction of its ancient right and privilege to hold in its own hands the power of determining who are its Members,

[cont.]

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections Bill—cont.

a right which the House has asserted and exercised to its great advantage for several hundred years, and upon the possession of which the dignity and independence of this House and the constitutional freedom of the electors greatly depend" (Mr. Alexander Mitchell); after long debate, Question, "That the words, &c." put, and agreed to; main Question put, and agreed to

Committee—R.F., 321

Question, Mr. J. Stuart Mill; Answer, Mr. Disraeli April 2, 702

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections [Salaries, &c.] Bill

c. Considered in Committee; Resolution Mar 27
Report Mar 30

Electric Telegraphs Bill

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Selater-Hoath)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) April 1, 678

After debate, Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> [Bill 82]

Question, Mr. Ayrton; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer April 2, 706

ELLENBOROUGH, Earl of

Parliament—Business of the House, Report, 565
Poor Relief, Comm. 457, 464

ENFIELD, Viscount, Middlesex

Sanitary Improvements, Rates for, 258

Entail Amendment (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 3 [Bill 86]

ERSKINE, Vice-Admiral J. E., Stirlingshire

Mauritius—The 86th Regiment, 1461

Scotland—Education, 2001

ESMONDE, Mr. J., Waterford Co.

Petit Juries (Ireland), 263

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R.
1958

Established Church (Ireland)

Commons—

Notice of Resolutions, Observations, Mr. Gladstone; Reply, Mr. Disraeli Mar 28, 33

Notice of Amendment (Lord Stanley) Mar 27, 356

Acts read:—

Moved, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the said Acts" (Mr. Gladstone) Mar 30, 469

Amendt. to leave out from "House," and add "while admitting that considerable modifications in the temporalities of the United Church in Ireland may, after the pending inquiry, appear to be expedient, is of opinion that any proposition tending to the disestab-

[cont.]

Established Church (Ireland)—cont.

lishment or disendowment of that Church ought to be reserved for the decision of a new Parliament" (Lord Stanley) Mar 30, 495; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Debate adjourned
 Debate resumed Mar 31, 578; after long debate, Debate further adjourned till Thursday
The Approaching Division, Questions, Mr. Yorke, Viscount Cranborne; Answers, Lord Stanley, Mr. Speaker April 2, 706
Maynooth Grant, Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 2, 708; Observations, Mr. Whalley April 3, 836
 Debate resumed April 2, 790; after long debate, Debate further adjourned
Regium Donum, Question, Mr. Vance; Answer, Mr. Gladstone April 3, 835 Debate resumed April 3, 837; after long debate, Question put; A. 330, N. 270; M. 60
 Division List, Ayes and Noes, 941
 Main Question put; A. 328, N. 272; M. 56

Acts considered in Committee

Question proposed, "That it is necessary that the Established Church of Ireland should cease to exist as an Establishment, due regard being had to all personal interests and to all individual rights of property" (Mr. Gladstone)

Committee—a.r.

Acts considered in Committee April 27, 1338

Question again proposed

Amendt. to leave out from first word "That," and add "so long as the Union between Great Britain and Ireland continues to exist, it is just and consistent that the principle of the Established Church should be maintained in Ireland, and its endowment on a scale suitable to the wants of the population" (Sir Frederick Heygate); Question, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Committee—a.r.

Question, Mr. Verner; Answer, Mr. Disraeli April 28, 1463

Acts considered in Committee April 28, 1466

Question again proposed; after long debate, Committee—a.r.

Acts considered in Committee April 30, 1583

Question again proposed; after long debate, Amendt. withdrawn; main Question put; Comm. divided; A. 330, N. 265, M. 65

Division List, Ayes and Noes, 1675; Committee—a.r.

Moved, "That the House, at rising, do adjourn till Monday next" (Mr. Disraeli), 1679; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Ministerial Statement—Defeat of the Government on the Irish Church Resolutions, Observations, Mr. Disraeli May 4, 1694; debate thereon

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Conolly); after long debate, Motion withdrawn

Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, Mr. Disraeli May 5, 1787

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Gladstone); after debate, Motion withdrawn

Meeting at St. James's Hall, Question, Mr. Verner May 7, 1886

Established Church (Ireland)—cont.

Acts considered in Committee May 7, 1886

(2.) Moved, That, subject to the foregoing considerations, it is expedient to prevent the creation of new personal interests by the exercise of any public patronage, and to confine the operations of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland to objects of immediate necessity, or such as involve individual rights, pending the final decision of Parliament" (Mr. Gladstone); after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

(3.) Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present Session, the creation of new personal interests through the exercise of any public patronage, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishopsries, Bishopsries, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof" (Mr. Gladstone), 1898; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

Moved, "That when the Anglican Church in Ireland is disestablished and disendowed, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued; and that no part of the secularized funds of the Anglican Church, or any State funds whatever, be applied in any way, or under any form, to the endowment or furtherance of the Roman Catholic religion in Ireland, or to the establishment or maintenance of Roman Catholic denominational schools or colleges" (Mr. Sinclair Aytoun), 1902

After debate, Amendt. to leave out from the first word "That," and add "when legislative effect shall have been given to the First Resolution of this Committee respecting the Established Church of Ireland, it is right and necessary that the Grant to Maynooth and the Regium Donum be discontinued" (Mr. Whitbread), 1923; after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.;" Comm. divided; A. 85, N. 198; M. 113

Question, "That the words 'when legislative effect,' &c.;" be added May 7, 1925

Amendt. proposed to said proposed Amendt. by adding the words "due regard being had to all personal interests" (Mr. Gladstone), 1926; after short debate, Question, "That those words be there added," put, and agreed to Amendt. proposed to the said proposed Amendt. as amended, by adding the words, "And that no part of the Endowments of the Anglican Church be applied to the Endowment of the institutions of other religious communions" (Mr. Greene), 1931

Question, "That those words be added, &c.;" after short debate, Moved to report Progress (Mr. Whalley); Motion withdrawn; Question put, A. 97, N. 132; M. 35

Question, "That the words 'when legislative effect,' &c.;" put, and agreed to

Moved, "That the Chairman report the Resolutions to the House" (Mr. Gladstone), 1941; after short debate, Resolutions reported and agreed to

Established Church (Ireland)

Resolved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, humbly to pray that, with a view to preventing, by legislation during the present Session, the creation of new personal interests through the exercise of any public patronage, Her Majesty would be graciously pleased to place at the disposal of Parliament, Her interest in the temporalities of the Archbishopsrics, Bishopsrics, and other Ecclesiastical Dignities and Benefices in Ireland, and in the custody thereof" (Mr. Gladstone) May 7, 1849

LORDS—

The Resolutions, Notice (The Earl of Derby)
April 27, 1863; Question, The Earl of Derby; Answer, Earl Russell April 28, 1863
Ministerial Statement—Defeat of the Government in the Commons, Observations, The Earl of Malmesbury May 4, 1866; short debate thereon

EWING, Mr. H. E. CRUM- Paisley
Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1083
Canongate Annuity Tax, 2R. 1091

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR of the, see
CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER

EXETER, Marquess of
Marine Mutiny, 2R. 687

EYKYN, Mr. R., Windsor
Ireland—Murder of Mr. Featherstonhaugh, 1459

Fairs (Ireland) Bill (The Lord Clinton)
l. Read 2<sup>a</sup> * Mar 24 (No. 47)
Committee *; Report Mar 26
Read 3<sup>a</sup> * Mar 27
Royal Assent Mar 30 [31 Vict. c. 11]

FAWCETT, Mr. H., Brighton
Abyssinian Expedition—Estimates, 703, 1148
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, 3R. 2061
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1913, 1925
India—East India Civil Service, Res. 1838, 1851, 1859
Systems of Government, 422
Supply—Royal Palaces, 1006; Amendt. 1007, 1009, 1010
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1186

FERGUSON, Sir J. (Under Secretary of State for the Home Department), Ayrshire
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 27, 677; 3R. 2061
Colliers in the Wigan District, Strike of, 1224
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1910, 1934
Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), Leave, 1863
Sanitary Improvements, Rates for, 259

FEVERSHAM, Lord
Ministerial Statement, 1691

FITZGERALD, Lord O. A., Kildare Co.
Mutiny, Comm. cl. 67, Amendt. 325
Thames River, Obstructions in the, 1577

FORD, Colonel W. B., Downshire
Ireland—Case of Mr. Johnston, 469

FORSTER, Mr. C., Walsall
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, 2R. 1878

FORSTER, Mr. W. E., Bradford
Carriage of Parcels by Railway, 1333, 1334
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1553

FORTESCUE, Right Hon. Chichester S., Louth Co.
Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 222
Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1949

FRENCH, Rt. Hon. Colonel F., Roscommon Co.
Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 213
Ireland—River Shannon, 357;—Stake Nets on the, 467
Parliament—Conference Room, 1148
Peerage (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 1563
Post Office—Case of A. J. Duffy, Motion for a Committee, 1298
Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1951
Sunday Trading, 2R. 1085
Supply—British Embassy Houses, 993, 995
Harbours of Refuge, 1001
Royal Palaces, 1013
Supply—Proceedings in—Resolution, 1032

FRESHFIELD, Mr. C. K., Dorset
Sunday Trading, 2R. 1084, 1085

Friendly Societies Bill [H.L.]
(The Earl of Lichfield)
l. After short debate, 2R. deferred May 1, 1865
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>" (The Earl of Lichfield) May 5, 1875; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup>, after short debate (No. 43)

GALLWEY, Sir W. P., Thirsk
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1556, 1694
Supply—Enrolled Pensioners, &c. 284

GALWAY, Viscount, Retford (East)
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1. 1660
Parliament—Business of the House, 1661

Garret King at Arms
Question, Mr. Alderman Lusk; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth Mar 23, 39

GASELEE, Mr. Serjeant S., *Portsmouth

Army—Fortifications, Res. 2034, 2038
 Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm.
cl. 6, 672
 Boundary, 146; 2R. Motion for Adjournment, 1014
 Ceylon—Condition of, Motion for Committee, 982
 County Financial Boards, 2R. 1557, 1558, 1559
 Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at,
 Elections, Comm. 311
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res.
 1907
 Navy—Flogging on Board the "Favourite," 35
 Supply—British Embassy Houses, 989, 997
 Mission House, Teheran, 999
 Royal Palaces, 1007, 1009, 1013

GIBSON, Right Hon. T. M., *Ashton-under-Lyne

Electric Telegraphs, Leave, 682
 Libel, 2R. 668
 Pilotage, Compulsory, Res. 381, 382, 384

GILPIN, Colonel R. T., *Bedfordshire

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 68

GILPIN, Mr. C., *Northampton

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm.
 Amendt. 1033
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1305

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E., *Lancashire, S.

Commissions, Permanent Expenses of, Res.
 1291
 Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 40; 3R.
 101
 Edinburgh, Duke of, Address to Her Majesty, 1336
 Established Church (Ireland), Motion of Resolutions, 32, 35
 Established Church (Ireland), 356; Comm.
 470, 500, 709, 750, 797, 924, 1364, 1379,
 1418, 1423, 1453; Res. 1, 1650, 1660, 1679;
 Res. 2, 1886; Res. 3, 1898, 1901, 1914, 1916;
 Amendt. 1925, 1930, 1932, 1933, 1938; Motion for Adjournment, 1941, 1944
 Ireland—Questions, &c.
 Presbytery of Antrim, 1581
 Regium Donum, The, 835
 Licences, Res. 157
 Ministerial Statement, 827, 1706, 1707, 1708,
 1745; Motion for Adjournment, 1787, 1818,
 1819
 Parliament—Arrangement of Business, 263,
 264, 1679, 1680
 Representation of the People (Scotland), 2004
 Roman Catholic Oath, 1582
 Supply—Proceedings in—Resolution, 1465
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1166,
 1169, 1173, 1190; Comm. Res. 1, 1746,
 1753, 1772

GOLDNEY, Mr. G., *Chippenham

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm.
cl. 6, 672, 1064; add. cl. 1066; Consid. cl. 4, Amendt. 1876
 Commissions, Permanent Expenses of, Res.
 1280, 1295

GOLDNEY, Mr. G.—*cont.

Supply—Mission House, Teheran, 999
 Royal Palaces, 1005, 1012
 Supply—Proceedings in—Resolution, 1032,
 1466
 Turnpike Trusts, Motion for an Address, 2015

GOLDSMID, Sir F. H., *Reading

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm.:
cl. 6, 674; cl. 27, 676; Motion for Adjournment, 1063, 1064; add. cl. 1065, 1066;
Consid. add. cl. 1564
 Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 1236

GOLDSMID, Mr. J., *Honiton

Ministerial Statement, 1809

GORDON, Right Hon. E. S., see ADVOCATE,
The Lord*GORST, Mr. J. E., *Cambridge Bo.

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm.
cl. 4, 1059
 Ceylon—Condition of, Motion for a Committee, 978
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1340

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J., *London

Army—Fortifications, Res. 2054
 Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm.
 Schedule, 1066; Consid. 1568; Schedule,
 1877
 Commissions, Permanent Expenses of, Res.
 1295
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 599, 603
 India—Bank of Bombay, 2039
 London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance,
 Comm. 199; cl. 2, 204; add. cl. 205; Consid.
add. cl. 327
 Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 1, 1758

Government of India Act Amendment Bill (Sir S. Northcote, Sir J. Fergusson)

c. Motion for Leave (Sir Stafford Northcote)
 April 23, 1201

Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> [Bill 91]

Governor General of India Bill

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir James Fergusson)
c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 23 [Bill 92]

GRAHAM, Mr. W., *Glasgow

Sunday Trading, 2R. Amendt. 1085

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Stacpoole, Mr. Corbally, The O'Conor Don)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr.
 Stacpoole) Mar 25, 209 [Bill 14]

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (The Earl of Mayo);
 after debate, Question, "That 'now,' &c.;"
 A. 57, N. 70; M. 13; words added; 2R. put off for six months

Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland)

Moved, "That the Select Committee on Grand Jury Presentments do consist of Nineteen Members (Mr. Vance) Mar 23, 101; after debate, Motion and original Question withdrawn

Moved, "That the Select Committee on Grand Jury Presentments do consist of Nineteen Members" (Mr. Vance) Mar 25, 238; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

GRANT, Mr. A., *Kidderminster
Belgium, Riots in, 837

GRANVILLE, Earl

Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, Motion for a Committee, 248

Education, 1R. 129, 137; 2R. 1321

Education, Technical — Whitworth Scholarships, 820

Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1434, 1443, 1446

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 692, 694

GRAVES, Mr. S. R., *Liverpool

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 14, 675; cl. 27, 676; cl. 35, 678

Customs Officers, Grievances of, 1555

Merchant Shipping Consolidation, 699

Ministerial Statement, 1803

Passenger Acts, 1574

Pilotage, Compulsory, Res. 386

Postal—West India Mails, 1222

Supply—Harbours of Refuge, 1000, 1001

GRAY, Sir J., *Kilkenny Bo.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 757

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 214

Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland), Nomination of Committee, Motion for Adjournment, 101

Ireland—Imprisonment of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott, 445, 446

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1900

GREENE, Mr. E., *Bury St. Edmunds

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 6, 674; Consid. 1568

Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1074

Colliery Accidents, 1164

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. Amendt. 1931, 1940

Licences, Res. 159

Metropolis Gas, 2R. 798

Supply—Mission House, Teheran, 909

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1182

GREGORY, Mr. W. H., *Galway Co.

British Museum, 388, 405

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. 1041

Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 1236

India—Furloughs, 1576

Ireland—Cattle Plague, 1784

Deaths from Small Pox, 1784

Wilson, Rev. Mr., Explanation, 264

GREVILLE-NUGENT, Colonel F. S., *Longford Co.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 881

Parliament—Members' Seats in this House, 697

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1957

GREY, Earl

Bankruptcy Acts Repeal, Comm. 1220

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1132

Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 819

Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, Motion for a Committee, 251

Marine Mutiny, 2R. 686, 687

Ministerial Statement, 1687, 1688

Plate, River, Hostilities in the, 456

Poor Relief, Comm. 464

Victoria—Appropriation Act, 1905

GREY, Right Hon. Sir G., *Morpeth

Army—Fortifications, Res. 2052

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1913, 1934

GRIFFITH, Mr. C. Darby, *Devizes

Army—Military Prisons, 38

Boundary Commission, 146

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 3, 1055, 1057; cl. 4, 1059, 1061; cl. 6, 1062

County Financial Boards, 2R. 1557

Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 1268

Debates in the House of Lords, 1786

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 3, 1900, 1926, 1937

Marine Mutiny, 2R. 99

Member for Thetford—Titles of Dignity, 831

Ministerial Statement, 1729, 1818

Mutiny, 2R. 238; Comm. cl. 32, Amendt. 325

Supply—Volunteer Corps, 260, 284

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1189; Comm. Res. 2, Amendt. 1773

GROSVENOR, Hon. Capt. R. W., *Westminster

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1360

GURNEY, Rt. Hon. Russell, *Southampton

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 3, 1057

HADFIELD, Mr. G., *Sheffield

Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1081

Charitable Institutions, Taxation of, 1693

Middlesex Registry Office, 1147

Religious, &c. Building (Sites), 2R. 662

HALIFAX, Viscount

Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1451, 1453

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 691, 695

Public Offices, The New, 104

Railways Regulation—The Parcels Clause, 1425

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord C. (Vice Chamberlain of the Household), Tyrone Co.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1614

Grand Jury Fees (Ireland), 2R. 215

Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. 219

Sunday Trading, 2R. 1086

HAMILTON, Lord C. J., Londonderry City
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 767

HAMILTON, Viscount, Donegal Co.
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 886

HANKEY, Mr. T., Peterborough
Army—Cooking Apparatus, 257, 463
Tancred's Charity, 2R. 232
Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 2, 1774

HANMER, Sir J., Flint, &c.
Private Bill Legislation, 353, 356

HARDCASTLE, Mr. J. A., Bury St. Edmunds
Thames, River—Obstructions in the, 1577
Turnpike Trusts, Motion for an Address, 2021

HARDINGE, Viscount
Marine Mutiny, 2R. 685

HARDWICKE, Earl of
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1140
Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1449

HARDY, Right Hon. G. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), Oxford University

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 6, 673; cl. 8, 675

Barrett, The Convict, 1879

Boroughs and Divisions of Counties, Leave, 196

Boundary, 706; 2R. 1014, 1786

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 3, 1057; cl. 4, 1059, 1060; cl. 6, 1062

County Financial Boards, 2R. 1548, 1558, 1559, 1594

Devises Gael, 1455

Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, 2R. 327; Comm. 1194, 1200

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 556, 575, 850, 1398; Res. 2, 1894

Metropolis—Deptford Creek Outfalls, 357

Middlesex Registry Office, 1147

"Oliver Twist," Play of, 835

Peerage (Ireland), 2R. 1564

Stone, Police Sergeant, Case of, 702

Sunday Trading, 2R. 1086

Surrey Constabulary, Dismissal of an Inspector of the, 571

Turnpike Trusts, 834, 1462; Motion for an Address, 2018

Weights and Measures, False, Commission on, 467

HARDY, Mr. J., Dartmouth
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1919

HARROWBY, Earl of
Education, 1R. 137; 2R. 1318
Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1453
Friendly Societies, 2R. 1780
Parliament—Business of the House, Report, 570

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of, Lancashire, N.

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 61

Army—Reserve Forces, 1787

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1504, 1514

Mutiny, Consid. 558

Supply—Enrolled Pensioners, &c. 284, 285

Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 1, 1765

HAY, Lord W. M., Taunton

Bank of Bombay, 1223

Metcalfe, Sir T. J., Case of, Motion for a Committee, 1273

Systems of Government in India, 405

HAY, Rear Admiral Sir J. C. D. (Lord of the Admiralty), Stamford

Army—Fortifications, Res. 2028, 2033, 2035

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1423; Res. 1, 1623

HAYTER, Mr. A. D., Wells

Army—Ball Cartridges, 2002

HEADLAM, Right Hon. T. E., Newcastle-upon-Tyne

Boundary, 2R. 1014

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, 2R. 1874

Mutiny, Comm. cl. 22, 323

Navy—Coal for the, 1575

Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites), 2R. 668

Supply—Royal Palaces, 1013

HEATHCOTE, Sir W., Oxford University

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1598

HENLEY, Lord, Northampton

County Financial Boards, 2R. 1547

Tancred's Charity, 2R. 233

Turnpike Trusts, Motion for an Address, 2014

HENLEY, Right Hon. J. W., Oxfordshire

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 6, 672; cl. 27, 676; Consid. 1569

Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1081

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 3R. 208

County Financial Boards, 2R. 1551

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. 319

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 716

Libel, 2R. 670

Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 182

HERBERT, Right Hon. Major General
Percy E. (Treasurer of the Household), Shropshire, S.

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 84, 92
Army—Fortifications, Res. 2038
Military Education, Res. 1835

HERBERT, Mr. H. A., *Kerry Co.
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1940

HEYGATE, Sir F. W., *Londonderry Co.
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Amendt.
1845; Res. 1, 1675; Res. 2R. 1897

HIBBERT, Mr. J. T., *Oldham
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm.
cl. 28, Amendt. 677, 678
Boundary, 1786
Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm.
cl. 3, 1056; cl. 4, 1059, 1061
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1939

HOGG, Colonel J. M., *Bath
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, 3R. 2061
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1501
London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance,
Comm. 200; cl. 2, 202, 204

HOLLAND, Mr. E., *Evesham
Rule of the Road at Sea, 475

HOPE, Mr. A. J. Beresford, *Cambridge University
British Museum, 396
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 852
Tancred's Charity, 2R. 224

HORSFALL, Mr. T. B., *Liverpool
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 748, 750
Foreign Cattle, Importation of, 1149
Pilots, Compulsory, 378

HORSMAN, Right Hon. E., *Stroud
Brazil—War in, 359
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1393,
1398, 1400; Res. 1931
Ministerial Statement, 829, 1807

HOTHAM, Lord, *Yorkshire, F.R.
Private Bill Legislation—Standing Order 131
Repeal, 145

HOUGHTON, Lord
Capital Punishment within Prisons, 2R. 1879

HUBBARD, Mr. J. G., *Buckingham
Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1082, 1083
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1179

HUGHES, Mr. T., *Lambeth
Sunday Trading, 2R. 1084

HUNT, Right Hon. G. W., see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER

VOL. CXCI. [THIRD SERIES.]

HURST, Mr. R. H., *Horsham
Victoria—Case of the Convict Millar, 1576

HURT, Right Hon. Sir W., *Gateshead
Railway and Joint Stock Companies Accounts,
2R. 1535
Railways, Revision of, 35

Inclosure Bill

(Sir J. Fergusson, Mr. Secretary G. Hardy)
c. Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 23 [Bill 73]
Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report Mar 26
Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 31
l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Clinton) Mar 31 (No. 61)
Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 2
Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 3
Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 23
Royal Assent May 20 [31 Vict. c. 31]

India

Bank of Bombay, Question, Sir Henry Rawlinson; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Mar 24, 147; Question, Mr. Dyce Nicol; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Mar 27, 420; debate thereon; Questions, Lord William Hay; Answers, Sir Stafford Northcote April 24, 1223; Question, Mr. Ayrton; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote May 8, 2055

Bonus Committee, The—Officers of the Late Company's Army, Question, Mr. Bruen; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Mar 26, 261
Civilian Judges (Bombay), Question, Sir Robert Collier; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote April 28, 1460

Contract Law—Reports of Indian Law Commissioners, Question, Mr. Kinnaid; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Mar 24, 147

Field Officers of the Indian Army, Retirement of, Question, Mr. Dimdale; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote April 3, 830

Furloughs, Question, Mr. Gregory; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote April 30, 1576

Hyderabad—Political Section, Administrative Report, Question, Mr. Stapoole; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote April 23, 1148

Irrigation, Postponement of Motion (Mr. Kinnaid) Mar 31, 575

Irrigation of Public Lands, Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 20, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, the advance of £600,000 of public money on loan to a private company of adventurers styling themselves the Madras Irrigation Company, granted on the 15th day of May 1866 for their sole benefit, and likewise the offer of a large loan on similar terms announced by the Secretary of State on the 20th day of February last as contemplated to be given to the East India Irrigation and Canal Company, are acts of impropriety, are mischievous in policy, and should be discontinued (Mr. Smollett), 946; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Madras Irrigation Company, Observations, Mr. Stansfeld April 24, 1296

Religious Provision for Soldiers in India, Question, Mr. O'Reilly; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Mar 26, 262

India—cont.

Systems of Government in, Observations, Lord William Hay, Mr. Smollett, Mr. Fawcett Mar 27, 405

Telegraphic Communication with, Question, Mr. Dyce Nicol; Answer, Mr. Corry April 28, 1458

Indian Railway Companies Bill

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Solater-Booth)

c. Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 23 [Bill 55]

Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report Mar 24

Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 26

i. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Clinton) Mar 27 (No. 57)

Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 30

Committee<sup>o</sup> Mar 31 (No. 63)

Report<sup>o</sup> April 2

Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 3

Royal Assent May 29 [21 Vid. c. 26]

Industrial Schools (Ireland) Bill

(The O'Connor Don, Mr. Monsell, Mr. Leader)

c. Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (The O'Connor Don) Mar 25, 217

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr. Vance); after short debate, Question, "That the words, &c.;" A. 82, N. 46; M. 36; main Question put, and agreed to; Committee—R.F. [Bill 6]

Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 1

Considered as amended<sup>o</sup> April 2

Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 3

i. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Earl of Kimberley) April 23

Read 2<sup>o</sup> May 7 (No. 69)

Industrial Schools (Ireland) [Expenses]

c. Considered in Committee; Resolution Mar 27
Report Mar 30

Infectious Diseases

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 8, To leave out from "That," and add "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to cause such inquiry to be instituted into the spread of disease by infection (distinguished from contagion) as may tend to check legislation and action in cases unsupported by the evidence, which in times of excitement saves a people from the commission of great crimes or great follies" (Sir Jervoise Clarke Jervoise), 2005; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

INNES, Mr. A. C., *Newry

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1611

Investment of Trust Funds Act Amendment Bill

(Mr. Henry B. Sheridan, Mr. Ayrton)

c. Ordered<sup>o</sup> Mar 24

Ireland

Ardfert Tower—Kerry Grand Jury, Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 25, 208

Bankruptcy (Ireland), Question, Mr. Serjeant Armstrong; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland April 3, 830

Cattle Plague, Question, Mr. Gregory; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 5, 1784

Downy, Mr. J., Arrest of, Question, Mr. Rearden; Answer, The Earl of Mayo April 3, 833

Grand Jury Presentments, Moved, "That the Select Committee on Grand Jury Presentments do consist of Nineteen Members" (Mr. Vance) Mar 23, 101; after debate, Motion and original Question withdrawn

Moved, "That the Select Committee on Grand Jury Presentments do consist of Nineteen Members" (Mr. Vance) Mar 25, 238; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Habeas Corpus Act—Release of Prisoners, Question, Mr. Bagwell; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 5, 1784

Land Question, Question, Mr. Pim; Answer, The Earl of Mayo April 28, 1459

Local Government Acts, Question, Mr. Pim; Answer, The Earl of Mayo Mar 26, 256; April 28, 1457

Presbytery of Antrim, Questions, Sir Charles Lanyon, Sir Thomas Bateson; Answers, Mr. Gladstone April 30, 1581

Prisoners Convicted of Seditious Libel—Treatment of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott, Question, Mr. Stock; Answer, The Earl of Mayo Mar 26, 259; Question, Mr. Maguire; Answer, The Earl of Mayo Mar 27, 439; debate thereon

Railway Commission, Report of, Question, Mr. Monsell; Answer, The Earl of Mayo April 28, 1463

River Shannon—Fish Passes, Question, Colonel French; Answer, The Earl of Mayo Mar 27, 357—Stake Nets, Question, Colonel French; Answer, The Earl of Mayo Mar 30, 467

Searching Suspicious Persons, Question, Mr. Blake; Answer, The Earl of Mayo Mar 30, 468

Small-pox, Deaths from—The Vaccination Act, Question, Mr. Gregory; Answer, The Earl of Mayo May 5, 1784

Spirit Licences, Duty on, Question, General Dunne; Answer, Mr. Solater-Booth Mar 23, 38

State of Ireland, The Debate on—Wilson, The Rev. Mr., Personal Explanation, Mr. Gregory Mar 26, 264

See Established Church (Ireland)—State of Ireland—Resolution (Mr. Maguire)

JERVOISE, Sir J. Clarke, *Hampshire, S.

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 6, 673

Cholera in the Mediterranean, 703

Infectious Diseases, Motion for an Address, 2005

Vaccination—Small-pox at Woolwich, 701

Judgment Debtors Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Read 2<sup>o</sup> * Mar 23 (Nos. 32-76)
Committee * ; Report April 24
Bill re-committed

Jurors' Affirmations (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. Craufurd, Mr. Dunlop)

c. Ordered ; read 1<sup>o</sup> * May 8 [Bill 110]

KARSLAKE, Sir J. B., see Attorney General,
The

KARSLAKE, Mr. E. K., Colchester

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1374
Supply—British Embassy Houses, 985

KENDALL, Mr. N., Cornwall, E.

County Financial Boards, 2R. 1546
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1928
Grand Jury Cess, 2R. 213
Mines Assessment, 2R. 1868
Ministerial Statement, 1741

KENNEDY, Mr. T., Louth Co.

Crete, Insurrection in, 705

KIMBERLEY, Earl of

Crete, Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 814

Education, 2R. 1310

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 695
Poor Relief, Comm. 463

KINGLAKE, Mr. A. W., Bridgwater

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
Elections, Comm. 297

KINSTON, Earl of

Victoria—Appropriation Act, 2001

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Consid.
1567

India—Questions, &c.

Bank of Bombay, 430, 2060

Contract Law, 147

Irrigation, 575

Madras Irrigation Company, 1302

Irrigation of Public Lands, India, Res. 967

Registration of Writs (Scotland), 2R. 100

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
99

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. E. H., Sandwich

Turnpike Trusts, Motion for an Address, 2013

KNOX, Hon. Colonel W. Stuart, Dungannon

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 97

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 469, 627,
763, 1948

Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland), Nomination of Comm. Amendt. 101

Ministerial Statement, 1807

Representation of the People (Scotland), Comm.
100

LABOUCHERE, Mr. H., Middlesex

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm.
cl. 6, 674 ; Consid. 1568 ; 3R. 2061

Licences, Res. 152

London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance,
Comm. 197 ; cl. 2, Amendt. 201, 202, 205

Mission House, Teheran, 998, 999

Royal Palaces, 1005, 1007 ; Amendt. 1008

Stone, Police Sergeant, Case of, 702

Supply—British Embassy Houses, 984, 988,
995

LAING, Mr. S., Wick, &c.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 541 ;
Res. 1001

Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 1, 1766

LAMONT, Mr. J., Buteshire

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res.
1905 ; Amendt. 1925

Scotland—Trawling for Herrings, 1882

Land Writs Registration (Scotland) Bill

(*The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary G. Hardy,
Mr. Walpole*)

c. Read 2<sup>o</sup> * Mar 23 [Bill 56]
Question, Mr. Childers ; Answer, Mr. Selater-
Booth April 3, 830

Land Writs Registration (Scotland) [Salaries, &c.]

c. Considered in Committee ; Resolution Mar 27
Report Mar 30

LANYON, Sir C., Belfast

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 833

Ireland—Presbytery of Antrim, 1581

LAWRENCE, Mr. Alderman W., London

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Consid.
Schedule, 1877

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm.
cl. 4, Amendt. 1061 ; cl. 6, 1062

Post Horse and Carriage Licences Duties, Motion for a Committee, 187, 195

LAWSON, Right Hon. J. A., Portarlington

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 551

LAYARD, Mr. A. H., Southwark

Abyssinian Expedition, 1337

Crete—Condition of, 1149

Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 1253

Royal Academy, The, 1580

LEATHAM, Mr. E. A., Huddersfield

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 507

LEATHAM, Mr. W. H., Wakefield

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1871

LEEMAN, Mr. G., *York City
 Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm.
cl. 6, 672; cl. 8, 675
 Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm.
 1041
 Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, 1200
 Private Bill Legislation—Standing Order 131
 Repeal, 141

LEFEVRE, Mr. G. J. Shaw, *Reading
 Married Women's Property, Leave, 1015
 Tancered's Charity, 2R. Amendt. 229, 231

LEFROY, Mr. A., *Dublin University
 Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1071
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 754;
 Res. 3, 1899

Legitimacy Declaration (Ireland) Bill
 [H.L.] (The Marquess of Clanricarde)

l. Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 26 (No. 27)
 Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report Mar 27
 Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 30
c. Read 1<sup>o</sup> April 3 [Bill 87]
 Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 21
 Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 22
 Considered as amended<sup>o</sup> April 23
 Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 24
 Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 20]

LENNOX, Lord H. G. C. G. (Secretary to the Admiralty), Chichester
 Marine Mutiny, Comm. 559; Consid. 574
 Navy—Coal for the, 1576
 School and Training Ships, 1786
 Navy Estimates, 148

LEWIS, Mr. Harvey, *Marylebone
 Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm.
cl. 6, 672, 673; add. cl. 1064; Schedule,
1067; Consid. 1565, 1566, 1569; Schedule,
1877; 3R. 2062

Libel Bill (Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Mr. Baines)
c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) April 1, 664; after de- bate, Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>

Licences

Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that all Licences injuriously affecting the Industry and Commerce of the Country should be abolished" (Mr. Marsh)
Mar 24, 148; after debate, Motion with- drawn

Licences Duties, Post Horse and Carriage, and Hackney Carriage Duties

Moved, "That this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Acts relating thereto" (Mr. Alderman Lau- rence) Mar 24, 187; after short debate, Mo- tion withdrawn

LICHFIELD, Earl of
 Friendly Societies, 2R. 1685, 1775
 Riots in Lancashire, 1221

LIDDELL, Hon. H. G., *Northumberland, S.
 Infectious Diseases, Motion for an Address,
 2008
 Ministerial Statement, 1816
 Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1186

LINCOLN, Bishop of
 Education, 2R. 1320

LINDSAY, Hon. Colonel C. H., *Abingdon
 Supply—Volunteer Corps, 270

LLOYD, Sir T. D., *Cardiganshire
 Army—Commissions, 358
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 885

Local Government Supplemental (1868)
Bill (Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy,
Sir James Fergusson)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 26 [Bill 77]
 Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 30
 Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 2
 Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 3
l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Clinton) April 23
 Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 28 (No. 70)
 Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 30
 Read 3<sup>o</sup> May 8
 Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 10]

Local Officers Superannuation (Ireland)
Bill (Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Mr. Pim, Sir
John Gray)

c. Bill withdrawn Mar 30 [Bill 17]

LOCKE, Mr. J., *Southwark
 Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm.
cl. 27, 677; cl. 28, 678; Consid. Schedule,
1877
 Ireland—Imprisonment of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott, 449
 London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance,
 Comm. cl. 2, 202, 203
 Metropolis—Park Lane, 1882
 Post Office—Southern District, 358

LONDON, Bishop of
 Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1118
 Education, 1R. 137

London Coal and Wine Duties Continu- ance Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Lord John Manners, Mr. Hunt)
c. Order for Committee read; Moved, "That Mr.
 Speaker do now leave the Chair" (Lord
John Manners) Mar 24, 196

Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add
 "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr.
Candlish)

After short debate, Question, "That the words,
 &c.:" A. 147, N. 33; M. 114

Main Question put, and agreed to
 Committee; Report Mar 24
 Consideration Mar 26, 326

Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 27

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Privy Seal) Mar 30
 Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 31 (No. 89)

Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 2

Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 3

Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 17]

LONGFORD, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for War)
Marine Mutiny, 2R. 683, 688

LOWE, Right Hon. R., Calne
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 728, 920
Ministerial Statement, 1719, 1812

LOWTHER, Mr. J., York City
Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1059, 1060

LUSK, Mr. Alderman A., Finsbury
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 70; Motion for Adjournment, 98
Army—Fortifications, Res. 2031
Military Education, Res. 1884
Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 3, 1056; cl. 4, 1060, 1061; cl. 6, 1062
Ceylon—Condition of, Motion for a Committee, 975, 978
Garter King at Arms, 89
Pilotage, Compulsory, Res. 376
Post Horse and Carriage Licences Duties, Motion for a Committee, 195
Supply—British Embassy Houses, 987, 991; Amendt. 995
Harbours of Refuge, 1000, 1001
Lighthouses Abroad, 1003
Mission House, Teheran, 997
Royal Palaces, 1004
Volunteer Corps, 272
Works, Buildings, &c. 290, 291; Amendt. 295

LYVEDEN, Lord
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, Comm. 1571
Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, Motion for a Committee, 247, 248
Parliament—Business of the House, Report of Select Committee, 566
Notice of Questions, 689, 692
Public Petitions, Motion for a Select Committee, 689
Plate, River, Hostilities in the, 452
Victoria—Appropriation Act, 1682, 1063

MACKINNON, Captain L. B., Rye
Navy—Retired Officers, 1693

MCLAREN, Mr. D., Edinburgh
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Consid. 1569
Canongate Annuity Tax, 2R. 1087, 1096, 1104, 1106
Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 3, 1056; cl. 4, 1059, 1061
Ceylon—Condition of, Motion for a Committee, 981
India—East India Civil Service, Res. 1843
Supply—British Embassy Houses, 990
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1188

MAGUIRE, Mr. J. F., Cork City
Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 216
Ireland—Imprisonment of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott, 439, 442, 443

MALMESBURY, Earl of (Lord Privy Seal)
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1145; Comm. 1571, 1574
Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 805, 816
Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, Motion for a Committee, 254
Edinburgh, Duke of, Address to Her Majesty, 1304
Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1449
Friendly Societies, 2R. 1781
Ministerial Statement, 1686
Parliament—Business of the House, Report, 560; Res. 690, 693, 694, 696
Proxies, 570
Public Petitions, Motion for a Select Committee, 689
Plate, River, Hostilities in the, 455
Public Offices, The New, 103, 104, 1684
Riots in Lancashire, 1221
Victoria—Appropriation Act, 1682

MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R.
(Chief Commissioner of Works, &c.),
Leicestershire, N.
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. add. cl. 1065; Consid. 1566
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1408, 1943
London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance, Comm. 198; cl. 2, 202, 203; add. cl. 204, 205; Consid. add. cl. 327
Metropolis—Burlington House, 467
Park Lane, 1882
Parliament—Business of the House, 1681
Conference Room, 1148
Royal Academy, The, 1580
Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 181
Supply—Royal Palaces, 1005, 1008, 1010

Marine Mutiny Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Corry, Lord Henry Lennox)
c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Corry) Mar 23, 99; after short debate, Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>
Committee Mar 30, 559; after short debate, Report
Considered as amended Mar 31, 573
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>o</sup>" (Lord Henry Lennox); after short debate, Bill read 3<sup>o</sup>
l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Earl of Longford) Mar 31
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (The Earl of Longford) April 2, 693; after short debate, Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>; Committee negatived
Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 3
Royal Assent April 3 [31 Vict. c. 15]

MARLBOROUGH, Duke of (Lord President of the Council)
Education, 1R. 105, 138; 2R. 1305, 1325
Education, Technical—Whitworth Scholarships, 822
Endowed Grammar Schools, 1783
Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 695

Marriage Law (Ireland) Amendment Bill

(The Marquess of Clanricarde)

l. Presented; read 1<sup>o</sup> May 3 (No. 89)

Marriages (Frampton Mansel) Bill(Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary G. Hardy)*c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 30 [Bill 79]Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 23

Committee; Report April 24

Considered as amended April 27

Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 28l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Clinton) April 30Read 2<sup>o</sup> May 1 (No. 86)

Committee; Report May 4

Read 3<sup>o</sup> May 5

Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 23]

Married Women's Property Bill(Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Stuart Mill)*c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre) April 21, 1015Bill ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> [Bill 89]MARSH, Mr. M. H., Salisbury

Commissions, Permanent Expenses of, Res. 1286

Devizes Gaol, 1455

Licences, Res. 148

MARTIN, Mr. P. Wykeham, Rochester

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. 307

Post Office—Case of A. J. Duffy, Motion for a Committee, 1297

MAYO, Earl of (Chief Secretary for Ireland), Cockermouth

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 553, 865

Grand Jury Cases (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 209

Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. 220; cl. 11, Amendt. 221, 222, 223

Ireland—Questions, &amp;c.

Arrests in, 833

Cattle Plague, 1784

Featherstonhaugh, Mr., Murder of, 1459

Habeas Corpus Act, 1785

Imprisonment of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott, 441, 445, 446

Johnston, Mr., Case of, 469

Land Question, 1459

Local Government, 1457

Railway Commission Report, 1463

Shannon, River, 358;—Stake Nets on the, 467

Searching Suspicious Persons, 468

Small-pox, Deaths from, 1784

Treatment of Prisoners, 359

Local Government Acts, 257

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1958, 1960

Medical Practitioners (Colonies) Bill [U.L.](The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos)*l. Presented; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 26 (No. 56)Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 2

Committee; Report April 3

Committee April 27 (No. 78)

Report May 5

Read 3<sup>o</sup> May 7MELLY, Mr. G., Stoke-upon-Trent

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, 3R. 2001

Metcalf, Sir T. J., Case of

Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 24. To leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the case of Sir Theophilus John Metcalf, C.B., as set forth in his Petition of the 24th day of February, and printed in the Appendix to the Fifth Report on Public Petitions on the 7th day of March 1868" (Major Anson), 1268; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

MetropolisBurlington House—The Royal Academy*, Question, Mr. Cowper; Answer, Lord John

Manners Mar 30, 467; Question, Mr. Layard; Answer, Lord John Manners April 30, 1589

Main Drainage—Deptford Creek Outfalls,

Question, Mr. Alderman Salomons; Answer, Mr. G. Hardy Mar 27, 357

Park Lane, Question, Mr. Locke; Answer, Lord John Manners May 7, 1882*Thames Embankment—Steamboat Piers*, Question, Mr. Watkin; Answer, Mr. Tite April 27,

1332

Thames, Obstructions in the, Questions, Mr. Harcourt, Lord Otho Fitzgerald; Answers, Mr. Stephen Cave April 30, 1577Metropolis Gas Bill(Mr. Morrison, Mr. Locke, Mr. Gorst)*c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Morrison) April 2, 798; after short debate,Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> [Bill 49]

Committee; Report April 3

Metropolis Subways Bill(Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Tite, Colonel Hogg)*

c. Committee; Report April 22 [Bill 41]

Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 23l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> April 24, and referred to the Examiners (No. 73)Middlesex Registry Office

Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy April 23, 1146

Military at Elections (Ireland) Bill(Mr. Serjeant Barry, Major Gavin, Mr. Esmonde)*c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 27 [Bill 95]MILL, Mr. J. Stuart, Westminster

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. 1047

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. 308, 702

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1928

Municipal Corporations (Metropolis), Leave, 1859

Supply, Proceedings in, Resolution, 1030

MILLER, Mr. W., Leith, &c.

Canongate Annuity Tax, 2R. 1098, 1105, 1106

MILLS, Mr. J. Remington, Wycombe (Chipping)

Sunday Trading, 2R. 1085

Mines Assessment Bill

(Mr. Percy Wyndham, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Mr. Henderson)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Percy Wyndham) May 6, 1864; after short debate, Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> [Bill 11]

MITCHELL, Mr. A., Berwick-on-Tweed

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. Amendt. 296

MOFFATT, Mr. G., Southampton

Bankruptcy Law, 265
Post Office Returns, 2001

MONCREIFF, Right Hon. J., Edinburgh

Canongate Annuity Tax, 2R. 1100
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 525
Representation of the People (Scotland), 1885

MONK, Mr. C. J., Gloucester

Consecration and Ordination Fees, 1332
Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 1225
Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, 2R. 327; Comm. 1198; cl. 1, 1201
Supply—British Embassy Houses, Amendt. 983, 988, 989

MONSELL, Right Hon. W., Limerick Co.

Army—Military Education, Res. 1830
Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1067; Explanation, 1454
Ireland—Railway Commission Report, 1463

MONTAGU, Right Hon. Lord R. (Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Education), Huntingdonshire

Cattle Plague, 1578
Education, Technical—Mr. Whitworth's Endowment, 700
Foreign Cattle, Importation of, 1149
France—Paris Exhibition, 357
Infectious Diseases, Motion for an Address, 2010
Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 177
Vaccination—Small-pox at Woolwich, 701

MORE, Mr. R. J., Shropshire, S.

Turnpike Tolls, 1461

MORRIS, Mr. G., Galway Bo.

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1959

MORRISON, Mr. W., Plymouth

Metropolis Gas, 2R. 798

MOWBRAY, Right Hon. J. R. (Judge Advocate General), Durham City

County Financial Boards, 2R. Amendt. 1558
Ecclesiastical Commissioners—Benefice of Kilpeo, 701
Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, Comm. 1196; cl. 1, 1201

[cont.]

MOWBRAY, Right Hon. J. R.—cont.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1512
Ministerial Statement, 1796

Municipal Corporations (Metropolis) Bill

(Mr. Mill, Mr. Thomas Hughes, Mr. Tomline, Mr. Burton, Mr. Layard)

c. Motion for Leave (Mr. J. Stuart Mill) May 5, 1859; after short debate, Bill ordered Read 1<sup>o</sup> May 7

Municipal Rate (Edinburgh) Bill

(Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Baxter)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 29 [Bill 99]

MURPHY, Mr. N. D., Cork City

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 211
Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 222

Mutiny Bill (Mr. Dodson, Sir John Pakington, The Judge Advocate General)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 24
Read 2<sup>o</sup>, after short debate Mar 25, 238
Committee; Report Mar 26, 321
Considered as amended Mar 30, 556
Read 3<sup>o</sup>, after short debate Mar 31, 573
l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Silchester) Mar 31
Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 2
Committee negatived
Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 3
Royal Assent April 3 [31 Vict. c. 14]

Navy

Flogging on H.M.S. "Favourite," Question, Mr. Serjeant Gascolee; Answer, Mr. Corry Mar 23, 35
Navy Estimates, The, Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox Mar 24, 147
Retired Officers, Question, Captain Mackinnon; Answer, Mr. Corry May 4, 1693
School and Training Ships, Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox May 5, 1785
Tenders for Coal, Question, Mr. Headlam; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox April 30, 1575

NEATE, Mr. C., Oxford City

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. 1046; cl. 4, Amendt. 1058; add. cl. 1063
India—East India Civil Service, Res. 1851
Supply—British Embassy Houses, 997
Turnpike Trusts, Motion for an Address, 2021

NEVILLE-GRENVILLE, Mr. R., Somersetshire, E.

Bristol, Representation of, 359
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1555
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1423

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1074, 1080
Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 3, 1056, 1058
Church Rates Commutation, 2R. 1535
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 39; 3R. 101; Motion for Adjournment, 207

[cont.]

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N.—cont.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 941,
1421; Res. 1, 1821; Res. 2, 1896, 1906,
1913, 1922, 1928, 1940, 1947
Ministerial Statement, 1722

New India and Foreign Offices

Question, Lord Redesdale: Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury Mar 24, 191; May 1, 1883; short debate thereon

New Writs Issued

April 3—For Launceston, v. Alexander Henry Campbell, Esq., Manor of North-
stead

For Chipping Wycombe, v. Hon.
Charles Robert Carington, now
Lord Carington

April 20—For Cockermouth, v. John Steel, esq., deceased

For The Parts of Kesteven and Holland, in the County of Lincoln,
v. Sir John Trollope, baronet, called up to the House of Peers

For Kent (Eastern Division), v. Sir Brook William Bridges, baronet, called up to the House of Peers

For Radnorshire, v. Sir John Benn
Walsh, baronet, called up to the House of Peers

For Leominster, v. Hon. Arthur
Walsh, Manor of Northstead

April 21—For Grantham, v. William Earle
Welby, esq., Chiltern Hundreds

April 22—For Bristol, v. Sir Samuel Morton Peto, baronet, Manor of North-
stead

For Stirling District of Burghs, v.
Lawrence Oliphant, esq., Chiltern
Hundreds

April 29—For Stamford, v. Viscount Cranborne, now Marquess of Salisbury

New Members Sworn

Mar 23—Edward Aldam Leatham, esq., Huddersfield

Mar 27—Samuel Carter, esq., Coventry

April 20—Hon. William Henry Peregrine Carrington, Chipping Wycombe
Henry Charles Lopes, esq., Laun-ceston

April 28—Andrew Green Thompson, esq.,
Cockermouth

Viscount Mahon, Leominster

April 30—William Earle Welby, esq., Parts of Kesteven and Holland, in the County of Lincoln

Edmund Turnor, esq., Grantham

Hon. Arthur Walsh, Radnorshire

John William Miles, esq., Bristol

May 4—John Ramsay, esq., Stirling District of Burghs

Viscount Ingestre, Stamford

Edward Leigh Pemberton the Younger, esq., Kent (Eastern Division)

NICOL, Mr. J. Dyce, Kincardineshire

India—Bank of Bombay, 426, 2057
Telegraphic Communication, 1458

Non-Traders Bankruptcy (Ireland) Bill
(The Marquess of Clanricarde)

l. Read 2<sup>a</sup> * Mar 23 (No. 38)

Committee*; Report Mar 26

Read 3<sup>a</sup> * Mar 30

c. Read 1<sup>a</sup> * April 28 [Bill 98]

NORTH, Colonel J. S., Oxfordshire

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 75

Army—Military Education, Res. 1832;—
Fever at Mauritius, 1883

Mutiny, Consider. 558

Supply—Works, Buildings, &c. 290

NORTHCOTE, Right Hon. Sir S. H. (Secretary of State for India), Devonshire, N.

Abyssinian Expedition—Estimates, 703, 1148,
1338;—Alleged Flogging of Mule Drivers in Abyssinia, 834

Army—Military Education, Res. 1834

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
Elections, Comm. 304

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 786;
Res. 1933

Government of India Act Amendment, Leave, 1201

India—Questions, &c.

Bank of Bombay, 147, 432, 1223, 1224, 2057

Bonus Committee, The, 261

Civilian Judges (Bombay), 1460

Contract Law, 147

East India Civil Service, Res. 1852

Furloughs, 1576

Hyderabad, 1148

Irrigation of Public Lands, Res. 958

Metcalfe, Sir T. J., Case of, Motion for a
Committee, 1274

Religious Provision for Soldiers in India, 263

Retirement of Field Officers of the Indian
Army, 830

Ministerial Statement, 1801

Parliament—Business of the House, 1681

"St. Abbe," Survivors of the, 260

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1185

O'BRIEN, Mr. J. L., Cashel

Army—Fortifications, 1456; Res. 2021, 2027,
2042, 2043, 2049, 2053

Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1077

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 213

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R.
1958

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.

Army—Promotions in the Coldstream Guards,
1679, 1883, 1884

Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1080

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1370

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 215

Ireland—Imprisonment of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott, 447

Ministerial Statement, 1741

Post Office—Case of A. J. Duffy, Motion for a
Committee, 1296, 1297

Supply—Harbours of Refuge, 1002

Lighthouses Abroad, 1004

O'CONNOR DON, The, Roscommon Co.
 Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 210
 Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland), Nomination of Committee, 101; Motion for Adjournment, 102, 238
 Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. 218; cl. 11, 221, 223

O'DONOGHUE, The, Tralee
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1383
 Ireland—Tower of Ardfert—Kerry Grand Jury, 208

O'LOGHLIN, Sir C. M., Clare Co.
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1590
 Libel, 2R. 664, 671
 Peerage (Ireland), 2R. 1559, 1564

O'NEILL, Mr. E., Antrim Co.
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 513

ONSLow, Mr. G. J. H., Guildford
 Surrey Constabulary, Dismissal of an Inspector of the, 571

O'REILLY, Mr. M. W., Longford Co.
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 73
 Army—Military Education, Res. 1832
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 629
 India—Religious Provision for Soldiers in India, 262
 Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. cl. 11, 223
 Poor Law—Gravesend Board of Guardians, 704

OSBORNE, Mr. R. B., Nottingham
 Army—Fortifications, Res. 2032, 2041
 Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 634, 771
 Ministerial Statement, 1805, 1807

OTWAY, Mr. A. J., Chatham
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, Amendt. 82, 98
 Army—Mortality in the 86th Regiment, Mauritius, 37, 360
 Marine Mutiny, 2R. 99; Comm. Amendt. 559; Consid. 574
 Mutiny, Comm. cl. 22, Amendt. 321; Preamble, Amendt. 326
 Supply—British Embassy Houses, 990, 993, 996
 Royal Palaces, 1007
 Volunteer Corps, 272
 Works, Buildings, &c. 288

OXFORD, Bishop of
 Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1134

Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Bill
 (Mr. Stephen Cave, Mr. Selater-Booth)
 c. Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report Mar 23 [Bill 54]
 Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 26
 l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Duke of Richmond) Mar 27
 Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 24 (No. 58)
 Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 30
 Read 3<sup>o</sup> May 1
 Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 9]
VOL. CXCI. [THIRD SERIES.]

PAGET, Mr. T. T., Leicestershire, S.
 County Financial Boards, 2R. 1555
 Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 184

PARKINGTON, Right Hon. Sir J. S. (Secretary of State for War), Droitwich
 Army—Questions, &c.
 Ball Cartridges, 2002
 Commissions, 358
 Cooking Apparatus, 257, 468
 Daily Payment of Men, 263
 Fortifications, 1456, 1457
 Military Education, Res. 1825, 1831
 Military Prisons, 39
 Mortality in the 86th Regiment, Mauritius, 37, 360, 1461, 1883
 Officers Holding Civil Appointments, 1333
 Promotions in the Coldstream Guards, 1579, 1883
 Reserve Forces, 1787
 Woolwich Arsenal, 1455
 Army, Administration of the, Res. 2004
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 40, 79, 80, 82, 95, 98
 Fortifications, Res. 2027, 2030, 2039, 2051
 Marine Mutiny, Consid. 574
 Mutiny, Comm. cl. 22, 323; cl. 32, 325; Preamble, 326; Consid. 556; Amendt. 558
 Parliament—Business of the House, 1681
 Supply—Enrolled Pensioners, &c. 284, 285
 Volunteer Corps, 278, 280, 281
 Works, Buildings, &c. 285, 291, 292, 294, 295
 Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 1, 1749, 1750, 1752, 1753, 1759, 1760, 1769, 1770

PALMER, Sir R., Richmond
 Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 3R. 206

PARKER, Major Windsor, Suffolk, W.
 County Financial Boards, 2R. 1555

Parliament

LORDS—

Business of the House, Moved, "To agree to the Report of the Select Committee on Business of the House" (The Lord Privy Seal) Mar 31, 560; after debate, Motion withdrawn

Private Bills, On Motion of the Chairman of Committees, Ordered, That no Private Bill brought from the House of Commons shall be read a Second Time after Friday the 12th Day of June next [and other Orders] April 27, 1303

Private Bills, The Easter Recess, Standing Order No. 179. Sect. 1. suspended; Time for Petitions against, extended to the First Day on which the House shall sit after the Recess at Easter April 2, 682

Præcises—Resolution, That the following Order be added to the Roll of Standing Orders: "Standing Order XXXIIa. Ordered, That the Practice of calling for Proxies on a Division shall be discontinued, and that Two Days' Notice be given of any Motion for the Suspension of this Standing Order" Mar 31

PARLIAMENT—LORDS—cont.

Public Petitions—Printing Petitions. After debate, Resolved, That a Select Committee be appointed to whom all Petitions presented to this House, other than Petitions relating to Private Bills, shall be referred, with Instructions to the said Committee to direct the printing for the Use of the House of such Petitions as they shall think fit (The Earl Russell) April 2, 688; List of the Committee April 24, 1221

Ordered, That the Name of the Lord presenting a Petition shall be written thereon May 1, 1685

Questions, Notice of, Moved. "That it is expedient that Notice of an Intention to ask a Question should be given in the Minutes, except in Cases which admit of no Delay" (The Lord Privy Seal) April 2, 090; after short debate, Motion withdrawn

Moved, "That it is desirable where it is intended to make a Statement or raise a Discussion on asking a Question that Notice of the Question should be given in the Orders of the Day and Notices" (The Lord Chancellor), 693; after short debate, Motion agreed to

Committees, Moved. "That the Committee of Selection are desired to exercise their Discretion in calling for the Service of Lords absent from the House" (The Lord Privy Seal)

Amendt. moved, to leave out from ("Selection") and insert ("should in the Exercise of their Discretion call more frequently than at present for the Service of Lords absent from the House") (Lord Chelmsford); Amendt. withdrawn

Moved, "That the Absence of any Lord from this House, except for sufficient Reason, ought not to prevent the Committee of Selection from calling for his Services" (The Viscount Halifax); Motion agreed to

Reports of Bills, Resolved. That in entering in the Journals the Reports of Bills amended in Committees of the Whole House, the only Name entered therewith shall be that of the Lord who moves the Reception of the Report and takes Charge of the Bill in that Stage (The Lord Privy Seal)

COMMONS—

Arrangement of Business, Question. Mr. Gladstone; Answer, Mr. Disraeli Mar 20, 263

Easter Recess, Moved. "That the House upon its rising do adjourn until Monday, 20th April;" Ministerial Statement (Mr. Disraeli) April 3, 826; after short debate, Motion agreed to; House, at rising, to adjourn till Monday, 20th April

Members' Seats in this House, Observations. Colonel Greville-Nugent; Reply, Colonel Sykes April 2, 697

Oath of Roman Catholic Members, Moved. "That the Oath taken by Roman Catholic Members previous to the alteration of the Oath on the 30th of April, 1866, be read by the Clerk at the Table" (Mr. Freville-Surtees) April 30, 1582; after short debate, Question put, and negatived

"Oliver Twist," Play of. The Lord Chamberlain, Question, Mr. Brady; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy April 3, 834

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—COMMONS—cont.

Order—Allusion to Debates in the House of Lords, Question. Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, Mr. Speaker May 5, 1786

Proceedings in Committee of Supply, Resolution [9th February 1858] relative to Proceedings in Committee of Supply read, as followeth:—

"That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be, without amendment" April 21, 1025

Moved, "That the said Resolution be rescinded" (Mr. Aytoun); after short debate, Debate adjourned

Debate resumed April 28, 1464; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

1. Resolved, That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be

2. Resolved, That after a Question has been proposed from the Chair for a reduction of the whole Vote, no Motion shall be made for omitting or reducing any item (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

Private Bills

Board of Trade Reports—Question. Mr. Waldegrave-Lealie; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave April 3, 831

Conference Room, The, Question. Colonel French; Answer, Lord John Manners April 23, 1148

Private Bill Legislation—Standing Order 131, Moved. "That Standing Order 131 (Competition to be a ground of locus standi) be repealed" (Mr. Dodson) Mar 24, 139; after short debate, Motion withdrawn; Personal Explanation, Mr. Stephen Cave, Sir John Hanmer Mar 27, 351

Partition Bill [B.L.] (The Lord Chancellor)

1. Presented; read 1st April 8 (No. 67)

Read 2nd April 27

Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 28 (No. 116)

Read 3rd April 30

c. Read 1st May 7 [Bill 107]

Passenger Steamers, Overloading of

Question, Mr. Sinclair Aytoun; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave Mar 27, 450

PATTEN, Right Hon. Colonel J. W. (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster), Lancashire. N.

Mutiny, Comm. cl. 22, 324

PEASE, Mr. J. W., Durham. S.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1483

London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance, Comm. 197

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1567

Pilotage, Compulsory, Res. 379

PEEL, Right Hon. Sir R., Tamworth
Scotland—Established Church, 1884

PEEL, Right Hon. Gen. J., Huntingdon
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 65
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 721, 1388
Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 1, 1764

PEEL, Mr. A. W., Warwick
India—Case of Sir T. J. Metcalfe, Motion for a Committee, 1271

PEEL, Mr. J., Tamworth
India—Bank of Bombay, 1224

Peerage (Ireland) Bill (Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Mr. Monsell, Mr. Shaw-Lefevre)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 2 [Bill 83]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Sir Colman O'Loghlen) April 20, 1559
Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Colonel French);
Question, "That 'now,' &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. and Motion withdrawn; Bill withdrawn

Perth and Brechin Provisional Orders
Confirmation Bill (The Lord Advocate,
Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 23 [Bill 74]
Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 26
Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report Mar 30
Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 31
l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Clinton) April 2 (No. 64)
Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 30
Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report May 8

Petit Juries (Ireland) Bill
Question, Mr. Esmonde; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 26, 263

Petroleum Act Amendment Bill
(Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 23 [Bill 93]
Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 27

Petty Sessions and Lock-up Houses, &c.
Bill (Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 23 [Bill 75]
Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 2
Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 20
Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 21
l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Clinton) April 23
Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 30 (No. 71)
Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report May 1

Pilotage, Compulsory—see Board of Trade,
Compulsory Pilotage

PRY, Mr. J., Dublin City
Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1073
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1924
Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. 220

[cont.]

PRY, Mr. J.—cont.

Ireland—Local Government, 1457
Land Question, 1459
Local Government Acts, 256
Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R.
1954

Plate. River, Hostilities in the Observations, Lord Lyveden; Reply, The Earl of Malmesbury Mar 30, 452

Police

Case of Police Sergeant Stone, Question, Mr.
Labouchere; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy
April 2, 702
Surrey Constabulary—Dismissal of Inspector Miller, Question, Mr. Onslow; Answer, Mr.
Gathorne Hardy Mar 31, 571

POLLARD-URQUHART, Mr. W., Westmeath
Co.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 516
Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 210
Licences, Res. 155

Poor Law

Gravesend Board of Guardians, Question, Mr.
O'Reilly; Answer, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach
April 2, 704
Dr. Rogers, Medical Officer of Strand Union,
Question, Sir John Simeon; Answer, Sir
Michael Hicks-Beach Mar 26, 261

Poor Law (Ireland) Amendment Bill
(Mr. Serjeant Barry, Major Gavin)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> May 4 [Bill 103]

Poor Relief Bill [H.L.] (The Earl of Devon)

l. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>"
(The Earl of Devon) Mar 24, 138; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee" (The Earl of Devon)
Mar 30, 457; after short debate, Motion withdrawn; Bill referred to a Select Committee
And, on April 2, Committee nominated; List of the Committee, 465

Post Office

Annual Reports, 1866 and 1867, Question, Mr.
Moffatt; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth May 8, 2001

Eastern Mail Services Estimates, Question,
Mr. Crawford; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth
Mar 26, 258

Post Office, General, Case of A. J. Duffy,
Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 24,
To leave out from "That," and add "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the circumstances connected with the removal of Anthony J. Duffy from his appointment of permanent clerk in the Circulation department of the General Post Office" (Sir Patrick O'Brien), 1296; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt.
withdrawn

Southern District Post Office, Question, Mr.
Locke; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth Mar 27, 358
West India Mail Contract, Question, Mr.
Graves; Answer, Mr. Selater-Booth April 24, 1222

POTTER, Mr. E., Carlisle
Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 169

POTTER, Mr. T. Bayley, Rochdale
France—Paris Exhibition, 356

POWELL, Mr. F. S., Cambridge
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 24, Amendt. 676; cl. 27, Amendt. ib., 677; cl. 28, Amendt. ib.; add. cl. 1064, 1065, 1066; Consid. 1566
Bristol, Representation of, 359
Ecclesiastical Commissioners Orders in Council, 1198; cl. 1, Amendt. 1201
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1937
Supply—British Embassy Houses, 987
Tanquer's Charity, 2R. 232

Prisons (Compensation to Officers) Bill
(Sir James Fergusson, Mr. Secretary G. Hardy)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 30 [Bill 80]
Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 2
Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 20
Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 21
l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Clinton) April 23
Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 27 (No. 72)
Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 28
Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 30
Royal Assent May 29 [31 Vict. c. 21]

Promissory Oaths Bill
(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Report of Select Committee Mar 23 (No. 51)
Committee<sup>o</sup> April 24 (No. 52)
Report<sup>o</sup> April 27
Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 28

Public Offices, The New

Question, Lord Redesdale; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury Mar 24, 102; May 1, 1683; short debate thereon

PUGH, Mr. D., Carmarthenshire
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 72
Mines Assessment, 2R. 1871

Queensland—Polynesian Labourers

Question, Mr. P. A. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Adderley May 7, 1882

Railways

Accident upon the Brecon and Neath Railway, Question, The Marquess of Clanricarde; Answer, The Duke of Richmond May 7, 1879

Carriage of Parcels by Railway, Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave April 27, 1333

Revision of Railways Bill, Question, Mr. Baxley; Answer, Sir William Hutt Mar 23, 35

Railways and Joint Stock Companies Accounts Bill

(Sir William Hutt, Mr. Elliot)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Sir William Hutt) April 29, 1535; after short debate, Bill read 2<sup>o</sup>

Railways (Extension of Time) Bill
(The Duke of Richmond)

l. Committee<sup>o</sup> Mar 27 (No. 6)
Report<sup>o</sup> Mar 30
Read 3<sup>o</sup> Mar 31
Royal Assent May 21 [31 Vict. c. 18]

Railways (Guards' and Passengers' Communication) Bill

(Mr. Henry B. Sheridan, Sir Patrick O'Brien)
c. 2R. deferred, after short debate Mar 24, 206 [Bill 66]

RAWLINSON, Sir H. C., Frome
India—Bank of Bombay, 147, 427

READ, Mr. C. S., Norfolk, E.
Cattle Plague, 1578
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1552

REARDEN, Mr. D. J., Athlone
Barrett, The Convict, 1579
Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1083
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1534, 1620
Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. 218; cl. 11, 223
Ireland—Arrests in, 883
Imprisonment of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott, 450
Libel, 2R. 672
Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1952

REBOW, Mr. J. G., Colchester
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1551

REDESDALE, Lord (Chairman of Committees)

Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, Motion for a Committee, 245
Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1452

Parliament—Business of the House, Report of Select Committee, 565, 570; Res. 684, 695

Public Petitions, Motion for a Select Committee, 689, 690
Poor Relief, Comm. 465
Public Office, The New, 102, 104, 1683, 1684

Reformatory Schools (Ireland) Bill
(The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Read 2<sup>o</sup> Mar 30 [Bill 65]

Registration of Writs (Scotland) Bill

[E.L.] (The Lord Colonsay)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (The Lord Advocate) Mar 23, 100; after short debate, Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> [Bill 62]

Regulation of Railways Bill—The Parcels Clause

Question, Viscount Halifax; Answer, The Duke of Richmond April 28, 1425

Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites) Bill

Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Basley, Mr. Leeman, Mr. Akroyd

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Hadfield) April 1, 662; after short debate, Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> [Bill 18]

Committee<sup>e</sup>; Report April 21

Considered as amended<sup>e</sup> April 22

Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 24

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Cranworth) April 27 (No. 77)

Renewable Leasehold Conversion (Ireland) Act Extension Bill

(Mr. Gregory, Mr. George Morris)

c. Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 2 [Bill 61]

Representation of the People Act (1867)

Compound Householders, Question, Mr. Schreiber; Answer, Mr. Disraeli May 5, 1785

Registration of Electors, Question, Sir Edward Buller; Answer, Mr. Disraeli April 28, 1458

Representation of the People (Ireland) Bill (The Earl of Mayo, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (The Earl of Mayo) May 7, 1949; after debate, Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> [Bill 71]

Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill

Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, Mr. Disraeli May 8, 2004

Poor Assessment, Motion for Return of Deductions allowed [and other Particulars] (The Earl of Airlie) Mar 27, 328; Motion agreed to

Representation of the People (Scotland) Bill

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir James Fergusson)

c. Committee deferred, after short debate Mar 23, 99 [Bill 29]

Question, Mr. Craufurd; Answer, Mr. Disraeli April 3, 829; Questions, Mr. Moncreiff, Mr. Bouverie; Answers, Mr. Disraeli May 7, 1885

Revenue Officers Disabilities Removal Bill (Mr. Monk, Sir H. Verney, Mr. Otway)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> Mar 24 [Bill 76]

RICHMOND, Duke of (President of the Board of Trade)

Brecon and Neath Railway, Accident on the, 1881

Capital Punishment within Prisons, 2R. 1879

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, Comm. 1572

Ministerial Statement, 1690

Railways Regulation—The Parcels Clause, 1425

Sea Fisheries, 2R. 465, 466

Riots in Lancashire—The Staffordshire Colliers

Question, The Earl of Lichfield; Answer, The Earl of Malmesbury April 24, 1221

ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Motion for Adjournment, 660, 710, 773, 779; Res. 1907

Sale of Liquors on Sunday, 40

ROMILLY, Lord

Bankruptcy Acts Repeal, 2R. 28; Comm. 1218, 1220

Royal Academy—Burlington House

Question, Mr. Cowper; Answer, Lord John Manners Mar 30, 467; Question, Mr. Layard; Answer, Lord John Manners April 30, 1580

ROYSTON, Right Hon. Viscount (Comptroller of the Household), Cambridge-shire

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1485

Rule of the Road at Sea

Question, Mr. Holland; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave April 2, 705

RUSSELL, Earl

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1111, 1142, 1217; Comm. 1570

Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for an Address, 817

Edinburgh, Duke of, Address to Her Majesty, 1304

Education, 1R. 134

Established Church (Ireland)—The Resolutions, 1435, 1437

Marine Mutiny, 2R. 687

Parliament—Business of the House, Report of Select Committee, 570

Notice of Questions, Res. 691

Public Petitions, Motion for a Select Committee, 688, 690

United States—The "Alabama" Claims, Motion for Papers, 333, 350

RUSSELL, Colonel Sir C., Berkshire

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 89

Mutiny, Comm. d. 22, 324

Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 1, 1766

"St. Abbe," Survivors of the

Question, Mr. Baillie Cochrane; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Mar 26, 260

ST. AUBYN, Mr. J., Cornwall, W.

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1867

Sale of Liquors on Sunday Bill

Question, Mr. Roebuck; Answer, Mr. J. A. Smith Mar 23, 40

SALISBURY, Marquess of (see also CRANBORNE, Viscount)
Victoria—Appropriation Act, 1892, 1894

SALOMONS, Mr. Alderman D., Greenwich
London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance, Comm. add. cl. 205
Metropolis—Deptford Creek Outfalls, 357
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1189

SAMUDA, Mr. J. D'A., Tavistock
Army—Fortifications, Res. 2038, 2053
London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance, Comm. 197; cl. 2, 203
Ways and Means, Comm. Res. 1, 1763

SAMUELSON, Mr. B., Banbury
Scientific Instruction, Motion for a Committee, 180, 186

SANDFORD, Mr. G. M. W., Maldon
Ministerial Statement, 1798
Supply—Royal Palaces, 1013

Sanitary Act, 1866—Sewage Utilisation Act, 1867—Levy of Rates
Question, Viscount Enfield; Answer, Sir James Fergusson Mar 26, 258

Sat First

April 2—The Lord Carington, after the Death of his Father
May 7—The Marquess of Salisbury, after the Death of his Father
May 8—The Earl of Kilesmere, after the Death of his Father

New Peers Introduced

The Right Hon. Sir John Trollope, Baronet, Baron Kesteven of Casewick in the County of Lincoln May 5
Sir Brook William Bridges, Baronet, Baron Fitzwalter of Woodham Walter in the County of Essex

SCHREIBER, Mr. C., Cheltenham
Compound Householder, The, 1785
Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 3R. Motion for Adjournment, 207
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 638; Res. 1939
Tancred's Charity, 2R. 236

Scientific Instruction

Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the provisions for giving instruction in theoretical and applied Science to the Industrial Classes" (Mr. Samuelson) Mar 24, 160; after debate, Motion agreed to; List of the Committee, 186

SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. G. (Secretary to the Treasury), Hampshire, N.
Army—Grant for Fortifications, 280
Coble, Mr., Case of, 1457
Commissions, Permanent Expenses of, Res. 1287
Consecration and Ordination Fees, 1332

[cont.]

SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. G.—cont.

Customs Officers, Grievances of, 1455
Garret King at Arms, 39
Ireland—Duty on Spirit Licences, 38
Land Writs Registration (Scotland) Fees, 830
Post Office—Questions, &c.
Duffy, A. J., Case of, Motion for a Committee, 1298
Eastern Mail Service, 258
Southern District, 353
West India Mails, 1222
Post Office Returns, 2001
Supply—British Embassy Houses, 992, 995, 997
Harbours of Refuge, 1001, 1002

Scotland

Education Bill, Question, Admiral Erskine; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 8, 2001
Established Church of—The Lord High Commissioner, Question, Sir Robert Peel; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 7, 1884
Poor Assessment, Motion for Return of Deductions allowed [and other Particulars] (The Earl of Airlie) Mar 27, 328; Motion agreed to
Representation of the People Bill, Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, Mr. Disraeli May 8, 2004
Roads, Legislation respecting, Question, Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie; Answer, The Lord Advocate Mar 27, 357
Travelling for Herrings Bill, Question, Mr. Lamont; Answer, The Lord Advocate May 7, 1882

SCOURFIELD, Mr. J. H., Haverfordwest

Commissions, Permanent Expenses of, Res. 1287
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1554
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1938
Railway and Joint Stock Companies Accounts, 2R. 1841
Turnpike Trusts, Motion for an Address, 2018

Sea Fisheries Bill

(The Duke of Richmond)

l. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>a</sup>" (The Duke of Richmond) Mar 30, 465; after short debate, Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> (No. 46)

Sea Fisheries (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Blake, Colonel Annesley, Lord Claud John Hamilton, Mr. Kavanagh)

a. Ordered; read 1<sup>a</sup> April 30 [Bill 101]

SELWIN-IBBETSON, Mr. H. J., Essex, S.
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1367

SEYMOUR, Rear-Admiral G. H., Antrim Co.
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1370

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley
Railways (Guards' and Passengers' Communication), 2R. 206

SIMEON, Sir J., *Isle of Wight

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm.
cl. 4, 1059
Rogers, Dr., Medical Officer of the Strand
Union, 261

Slave Trade. Zanzibar

Question, Sir T. F. Buxton; Answer, Lord
Stanley April 30, 1878

SMITH, Mr. J. A., *Chichester

Sale of Liquors on Sunday, 40

SMITH, Mr. J. B., *Stockport

India—Irrigation of Public Lands, Res. 970

SMOLLETT, Mr. P. B., *Dumbartonshire

India—Irrigation of Public Lands, Res. 946, 958
Madras Irrigation Company, 1301
Systems of Government in, 417

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The (Sir W. B. BRETT)
*Helston

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm.
cl. 4, 1060, 1061
Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Court, 2R.
1874
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 544
Mines Assessment, 2R. 1872
Pilots, Compulsory, Res. 382, 383

SOMERSET, Duke of

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, Comm.
1573
Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, Motion for a Committee, 249
Education, Technical—Whitworth Scholarships, 825
Ministerial Statement, 1689
Parliament—Public Petitions, Motion for a Select Committee, 689

Spain and Prussia—Treaty of Commerce

Question, Mr. Akroyd; Answer, Lord Stanley
April 23, 1147

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. J. E. Denison)
*Nottinghamshire, N.

Army—Fortifications, Res. 2030, 2051, 2053
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Consid.
1565; Schedule, 1877
Burials (Ireland), 2R. 1093
Canongate Annuity Tax, 2R. 1105, 1106
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1556
Debates in the House of Lords, 1786
Electric Telegraphs, Leave, 631, 682
Established Church (Ireland), 708, 1948
India—Madras Irrigation Company, 1302
Marine Mutiny, Consid. 574
Ministerial Statement, 1719, 1819
Mutiny, 3R. 573
Parliament—Members' Seats in this House, 698
Peerage (Ireland), 2R. 1564
Roman Catholic Oath, 1592, 1593

STACPOOLE, Mr. W., *Ennis

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 209
India—Hyderabad, 1148
Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R.
1959

STANHOPE, Earl

Ecclesiastical Titles in Great Britain and Ireland, Motion for a Committee, 239
Parliament—Questions, &c.
Business of the House, Report of Select Committee, 566
Notice of Question, Res. 693, 696
Public Petitions, Motion for a Select Committee, 689

STANLEY, Right Hon. Lord (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), *Lynn Regis

Belgium—Riots in, 837
Brazil—War in, 359
China—Treaty of Tien-tsin, 1147
Cholera in the Mediterranean, 704
Crete—Insurrection in, 705; Motion for an Address, 1261;—Condition of, 1149
Established Church (Ireland), 356; Comm.
Amendt. 495, 500, 707
Slave Trade, Zanzibar, 1578
Spain and Prussia—Treaty of Commerce,
1147
Supply—British Embassy Houses, 986, 987,
989, 995, 996
Mission House, Teheran, 998, 999
United States—The "Springbok," 2002

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord

Parliament—Business of the House, Report, 569
Poor Relief, Comm. 465
Sea Fisheries, 2R. 466

STANSFELD, Mr. J., *Halifax

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 859
India—Madras Irrigation Company, 1298, 1301

STIRLING-MAXWELL, Sir W., *Perthshire

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1178

STOCK, Mr. O., *Carlow Co.

Ireland—Treatment of Prisoners, 259

Stockbrokers (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Pim, Sir Benjamin Guinness)

a. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> May 5 [Bill 104]

STRONGE, Sir J. M., *Armagh Co.

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R.
1956

STUART, Colonel W., *Bedford

Army—Daily Payment of Men, 263
Burials (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 1083
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res.
1924
London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance,
Comm. 201
Marine Mutiny, 2R. 99

SULLIVAN, Mr. Serjeant E., Mallow

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1818

Grand Jury Cess (Ireland), 2R. 215

Sunday Trading Bill

(Mr. T. Hughes, Lord C. Hamilton, Mr. Lusk)
c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Thomas Hughes) April 22, 1884

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Graham); Question, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 65, N. 31; M. 87; Bill read 2<sup>o</sup> [Bill 40]

Supply

Proceedings in Committee of Supply, Resolution [9th February 1858] relative to Proceedings in Committee of Supply read, as followeth:—

"That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote, as the case may be, without amendment" April 21, 1825

Moved, "That the said Resolution be rescinded" (Mr. Ayrton); after short debate, Debate adjourned

Debate resumed April 28, 1864; after short debate, Question put, and agreed to

1. Resolved, That when it has been proposed to omit or reduce items in a Vote, the Question shall be afterwards put upon the original Vote or upon the reduced Vote as the case may be

2. Resolved, That after a Question has been proposed from the Chair for a reduction of the whole Vote, no Motion shall be made for omitting or reducing any item (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

SUPPLY

Considered in Committee Mar 23 — ARMY ESTIMATES—Statement of the Secretary of State for War (Sir John Pakington) on moving the First Resolution, 40

Resolutions reported Mar 24

Considered in Committee Mar 26, 268—ARMY ESTIMATES

Resolutions reported Mar 27

Considered in Committee April 2, 799—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Vote of £1,200,000 on account

Resolution reported April 3

Considered in Committee April 20—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—Class I.—Public Works and Buildings, 983 — Resolutions reported April 21

SURTEES, Mr. C. FREVILLE-, Durham, S.

Roman Catholic Oath, 1882, 1883

SURTEES, Mr. H. E., Hertfordshire

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 97

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 470

SYKES, Colonel W. H., Aberdeen City

Abyssinian Expedition, 1838

Army—Cooking Apparatus, 257

Fortifications, Res. 2020, 2030

Grant for Fortifications, 260, 1457

Military Education, Res. 1837

[cont.]

SYKES, Colonel W. H.—cont.

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 28, 677

Canongate Annuity Tax, 2R. 1104

Ceylon—Condition of, Motion for a Committee, 979

China—Treaty of Tien-tsin, 1147

India—East India Civil Service, Res. 1850, 1851

Parliament—Members' Seats in this House, 698

Supply—Questions, &c.

British Embassy Houses, 983, 984, 991, 993, 995

Mission House, Teheran, 998

Volunteer Corps, 269

Works, Buildings, &c. 287

Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1175

Tancred's Charity Bill (Mr. Beresford Hope, Mr. Walpole, Viscount Cranborne)

c. Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>o</sup>" (Mr. Beresford Hope) Mar 25, 224 [Bill 67]

Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Shaw-Lefevre); after debate, Question, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 69, N. 83; M. 14; words added; 2R. put off for six months

TAUNTON, Lord

Education, Technical — Whitworth Scholarships, 824

Endowed Grammar Schools, 1782, 1783

Parliament—Business of the House, Res. 692

Public Offices, The New, 1684

TAYLOR, Mr. P. A., Leicester

Queensland—Polynesian Labourers, 1882

Sunday Trading, 2R. 1085

Thames Embankment—Steamboat Piers

Question, Mr. Watkin; Answer, Mr. Tite April 27, 1832

Thetford, Member for—Titles of Dignity

Question, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, Mr. Disraeli April 3, 831

TITE, Mr. W., Bath

Metropolis—Thames Embankment, Steamboat Piers, 1332

Titles to Land Consolidation (Scotland)

Bill (The Lord Advocate, Mr. Secretary Gathorne Hardy, Sir Graham Montgomery)

c. Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 20

[Bill 57]

TORRENS, Mr. W. T. McCullagh, Finsbury

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Comm. cl. 6, 673; cl. 24, 676; cl. 27, 677; add. cl. 1004; Consid. 1565; add. cl. 1875, 1876, 1877

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 608

TREVELYAN, Mr. G. O., Tynemouth

India—East India Civil Service, Res. Amendt. 1843

Mutiny, Comm. cl. 22, 324

Turkey

Insurrection in Crete, Question, Mr. Kennedy ; Answer, Lord Stanley April 2, 705

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copy of the Instructions to the British Representative at Paris in reference to the identio Note proposed to be communicated to the Porte by Russia, France, Italy, and Prussia" (Lord Campbell) April 3, 803; after debate, Motion withdrawn; Question, Mr. Layard; Answer, Lord Stanley April 23, 1149

Amendt. on Committee of Supply April 24. To leave out from "That," and add "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of any Despatches or Correspondence between the Russian Government and the Foreign Office on the subjects of the Insurrection in Crete and of the condition of the Christians in Turkey in the years 1866 and 1867" (Mr. Monk), 1225; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after long debate, Amendt. withdrawn

Turnpike Tolls Legislation

Question, Mr. More; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy April 28, 1461

Turnpike Trusts Legislation

Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy April 3, 833

Amendt. on Committee of Supply May 8. To leave out from "That," and add "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copy of all the Communications received in reply to the Circular sent in February 1866 to certain Turnpike Trustees referred to in p. 9 of the Seventeenth Report on Turnpike Trusts, of which Extracts are therein given, together with the names of the Correspondents" (Mr. Clive), 2012; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn

United Parishes (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie, Major Walker, Mr. Wellwood Maxwell, Mr. McLagan)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 1 [Bill 81]
Read 2<sup>o</sup> April 23

Committee<sup>o</sup>; Report April 24
Considered as amended<sup>o</sup> April 27
Read 3<sup>o</sup> April 28

l. Read 1<sup>o</sup> (The Lord Colonsay) April 30
(No. 84)

United States

The Neutrality Laws—The "Alabama" Claims.
Motion for an Address for "Copies or Extracts of any further Correspondence that may have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States in reference to the Alabama and other claims" (The Earl Russell) Mar 27, 333; after debate, Motion withdrawn

"Springbok," Case of the, Question, Mr. Bentinck; Answer, Lord Stanley May 8, 2002

VOL. CXCI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Vaccination—Small-pox at Woolwich

Question, Sir J. Clarke Jervoise; Answer, Lord Robert Montagu April 2, 701

Vagrant Act Amendment Bill

(Mr. Pease, Mr. Akroyd, Mr. Liddell)

c. Ordered; read 1<sup>o</sup> April 30 [Bill 102]
Read 2<sup>o</sup> May 7

VANCE, Mr. J., Armagh City

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1494

Grand Jury Presentments (Ireland), Nomination of Committee, 101, 102, 238

Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. Amendt. 217, 221; cl. 11, 223

Ireland—Regium Donum, 835

Representation of the People (Ireland), 2R. 1955

VERNER, Mr. E. W., Lisburn

Established Church (Ireland), 1462;—Meeting at St. James's Hall, 1886

Industrial Schools (Ireland), Comm. 220

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 70

Supply—British Embassy Houses, 992

Works, Buildings, &c. 290, 294

Victoria—The Appropriation Act

Postponement of Motion, Observations, The Earl of Malmesbury May 1, 1682; short debate thereon

Observations, Lord Lyveden; Reply, The Duke of Buckingham May 8, 1963; long debate thereon

VIVIAN, Hon. Captain J. C. W., Truro

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 91

Mutiny, Comm. cl. 22, 323

Supply—Works, Buildings, &c. 288; cl. 67, 325

VIVIAN, Mr. H. H., Glamorganshire

Mines Assessment, 2R. 1870

WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE, Hon. G., Hastings

Board of Trade—Private Bills, 831

London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance, Comm. add. cl. 205

Passenger Steamers, Overloading of, 451

Scotland—Roads, 357

WALKER, Major G. G., Dumfriesshire

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 68

WALPOLE, Right Hon. S. H., Cambridge University

Capital Punishment within Prisons, Comm. cl. 4, 1059

Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at Elections, Comm. 317

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1 1682

4 B

WALBOND, Mr. J. W., Tiverton
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1859

WARREN, Right Hon. R. R. (Attorney General for Ireland), Dublin University

Bankruptcy (Ireland), 831
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1640 ;
Res. 1905, 1927
Grand Jury Oeas (Ireland), 2R. 214
Ireland—Tower of Ardfort — Kerry Grand Jury, 209
Imprisonment of Messrs. Sullivan and Pigott, 448
Mutiny, Comm. cl. 67, 325
Petit Juries (Ireland), 263

WATKIN, Mr. E. W., Stockport

Boundary, 706
Ceylon—Condition of, Motion for a Committee,
971, 976, 977, 982
Edinburgh, Duke of, Address to Her Majesty, 1336
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1339
London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance,
Comm. 199 ; cl. 2, 203
Metropolis—Thames Embankment, Steamboat
Piers, 1332
Private Bill Legislation—Standing Order 131
Repeal, 145
Supply—British Embassy Houses, 996

Ways and Means

Resolution [March 23] reported, and agreed to Consolidated Fund (£6,000,000) ; Bill ordered ; read 1st Mar 24
Considered in Committee April 23
Financial Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer on moving the First Resolution,
That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duty of Customs now charged on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the 1st day of August 1868 until the 1st day of August 1869, on the importation thereof into Great Britain and Ireland : viz.—Tea, the lb.—0s. 6d., 1149 ;
after long debate, Resolution agreed to ;
Resolution reported

Considered in Committee May 4, 1746
Property and Income Tax ; Resolution, 1746
£1,000,000, Exchequer Bonds May 4, 1773
Resolutions reported May 6
Considered in Committee—£600,000, Exchequer Bonds May 7, 2062
Resolutions reported May 8

Weights and Measures, Report of Com- mission on False

Question, Lord Eustace Cecil ; Answer, Mr.
Gathorne Hardy Mar 30, 467

Weights and Measures (Scotland) Bill
(Mr. Craufurd, Sir Edward Colebrooke)

c. Ordered ; read 1st May 8 [Bill 109]

WESTBURY, Lord

Bankruptcy Acts Repeal, 2R. 19
United States—The "Alabama" claims, Motion for Papers, 346, 350

WHALLEY, Mr. G. H., Peterborough

Army—Military Education, Res. 1838
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1554
Established Church (Ireland), 708 ; Comm.
1424 ; Res. 1, 1533 ; Res. 2, 1897, 1907,
1926 ; Motion for Adjournment, 1940
Ireland—Maynooth Grant, 836
Libel, 2R. 664
Mauritius, Fever at the, 661, 1460, 1461
Ministerial Statement, 1818
Navy—School and Training Ships, 1785
Turnpike Trusts, 833 ; Motion for an Address, 2016

WHITBREAD, Mr. S., Bedford

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 81
Election Petitions and Corrupt Practices at
Elections, Comm. 298
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 1421 ;
Res. Amendt. 1923, 1931
Ministerial Statement, 1810
Parliament—Business of the House, 1681

WHITE, Hon. Capt. C. W., Tipperary Co.
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. 637

WHITE, Mr. J., Brighton

Army—Officers holding Civil Appointments, 1333
Ways and Means—Financial Statement, 1180

WYLD, Mr. J., Bodmin

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 68
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1542, 1558
Metropolis Gas, 2R. 798
Mines Assessment, 2R. 1871

WYNDHAM, Hon. P. S., Cumberland, W.

Army, Administration of the, Res. 2003, 2004
County Financial Boards, 2R. 1547
Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1913
Mines Assessment, 2R. 1864, 1872

YORK, Archbishop of

Compulsory Church Rates Abolition, 2R. 1129

YORKE, Mr. J. R., Tewkesbury

Established Church (Ireland), 706

YOUNG, Mr. G., Wigton, &c.

Established Church (Ireland), Comm. Res. 1, 1627

ERRATA.

Page 853, line 28 from bottom, for "cautionary" read "reactionary."

" " line 27 " " for "substantia amor" read "substantive union."

END OF VOLUME CXCI., AND SECOND VOLUME OF SESSION 1867-8.

